had filled that office in the United States, and by his judicious and energetic measures rendered the most important services to the cause of the patriots. "The Americans," says a distinguished historian, "owe as much acknowledgment to the financial operations of Robert Morris as to the negotiations of Benjamin Franklin, or even the arms of George Washington." He pledged his private fortune to obtain supplies for the army, and originated the Bank of North America in 1781. He resigned his office in 1784, was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States in 1787, and was elected a Senator of the United States in 1788. He was imprisoned for debt in his old age. Died in Philadelphia in 1806.

Morris, (THOMAS,) an American lawyer and statesman, noted for his opposition to slavery, was born in Virginia in 1776. He was elected in 1830 a judge of the supreme court of Ohio, and in 1832 a United States Senator. Died in 1844.

Morris, (THOMAS A.,) D.D., an American Methodist divine, born in Kanawha county, Virginia, in 1794, was for a time editor of the "Western Christian Advocate," and in 1836 became Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Died September 2, 1874.

Morris, (WILLIAM,) English poet and worker in art, was born near London in 1834; was educated at Marlborough and at Exeter College, Oxford, and with D. G. Rossetti, Ford Madox Brown, and Burne Jones carried on the manufacture of household decorations. Among other works he published "The Defence of Guenevere," (1858,) "Life and Death of Jason," (1867,) "The Earthly Paradise," (1868–70), "The Story of Grettir the Strong," (1869,) "Love is Enough; or the Freeing of Pharamond," (1873,) "The Æneids of Virgil done into English Verse," (1876,) "The Story of Sigurd the Volsung and the Fall of the Niblungs," (a poem in 14 books, 1877,) a translation of the "Odyssey," (1887,) "The House of the Wolfings," (1889,) "The Roots of the Mountains," (1890,) "Poems by the Way," (1892,) "Socialism: its Growth and Outcome," (1893,) and "The Wood beyond the World," (1894.) Died October 3, 1896.

Morrison, (ARTHUR,) a British novelist, born in 1863. His works, which are strongly realistic in character, include "Tales of Mean Streets," (1894,) "A Child of the Jago," (1896,) etc.

Morrison, (LEWIS,) an American actor, born in Jamaica, West Indies, in 1845. He served in the American civil war, and became an actor in 1865, playing as support to Salvini, Forrest, Booth, and Cushman. He subsequently entered upon a starring career, his chief part in later years being Mephisto, in "Faust."

Morrison, (Rev. ROBERT,) D.D., an eminent English Orientalist and missionary, born in Northumberland in 1782. Having previously studied the Chinese language, he was sent by the London Missionary Society in 1807 to China, where he became translator to the East India Company's Factory at Canton. His translation of the New Testament came out in 1814, and was followed in 1815 by his "Chinese Grammar." In conjunction with Rev. Mr. Milne, he next translated the Old Testament into Chinese. It was completed in 1818, (in 21 vols. 12mo.) His great "Chinese Dictionary," printed at the expense of the East India Company, appeared in 1821. He visited England in 1824, and, having remained there two years, returned to his missionary labours in China, where he had founded in 1818 an Anglo-Chinese College. Among Dr. Morrison's other works we may name "Horæ Sinicæ," (1812,) a "View of China for Philological Purposes," etc., (1817,) and "Chinese Miscellany," (1825.) He was the first Protestant missionary to China, and as a Chinese scholar he occupies the highest rank. Died in 1834.

Mors, [Fr. LA MORT, là mor,] the Latin name of the personification of Death, [Gr. Θάνατος,] said to be the offspring of Night. According to Homer, Death was the brother of Sleep.

Morse, (EDWARD SYLVESTER,) an American naturalist, born at Portland, Maine, June 18, 1838. He studied at the Scientific School of Harvard University, and became professor of zoology and comparative anatomy in Bowdoin College. He has published many papers on the molluscoids, worms, lower arthropods, and other groups of the animal kingdom.

Morse, (JEDEDIAH,) D.D., an American geographer and divine, born at Woodstock, Connecticut, in 1761. He graduated at Yale College, and in 1789 became pastor of the First Congregational Church at Charlestown, Massachusetts. He is principally known by his geographical works, which were the first of the kind published in America, and which also obtained a European reputation. He likewise published several historical works, and a number of sermons. Died in 1826.

Morse, (JOHN TORREY,) JR., an American lawyer and author, born in Boston, January 9, 1840. He graduated at Harvard College in 1860. His principal works are "A Treatise on Banks," "Law of Arbitration and Awards," "Famous Trials," "Life of Alexander Hamilton," "Life of John Quincy Adams," and "Life of Thomas Jefferson." He edited the "American Statesmen" series of biographies.

Morse, (SAMUEL FINLEY BREESE,) an American inventor and artist, born at Charlestown, Mass., April 27, 1791, was a son of Rev. Jedediah Morse. He graduated at Yale College in 1810, and went to England, where he studied painting under Benjamin West. He returned home in 1815, and painted portraits at various places. He visited Europe in 1829, and returned in 1832. During the passage homeward he suggested the idea of an electric telegraph, in conversation with his fellow-passengers. He constructed the apparatus of a recording electric telegraph, by which he conveyed despatches through a small distance, in 1835. About the end of 1837 he applied to Congress for aid, without success. He went to England in 1838 to obtain a patent, which was refused. Wheatstone, an Englishman, had invented a different apparatus, for the same purpose, about 1837. In the spring of 1843, Congress voted thirty thousand dollars to enable him to construct a line between Washington and Baltimore. His invention was brought into successful operation on that route in 1844, since which it has been rapidly introduced into nearly all countries of the civilized world. This result has been called the greatest triumph which human genius has obtained over space and time. Mr. Morse received gold medals and insignia of honour from several European sovereigns. The representatives of the principal European powers, assembled in Paris about 1857, presented to him the sum of 400,000 francs as a recompense for his invention. Morse's system is generally preferred to that invented in England, on account of its greater simplicity. Died April 2, 1872.

See DUNLAP, "History of the Arts of Design in America," vol ii. chap. xxiii.; "North American Review" for January, 1828.

Morse, (SIDNEY EDWARDS,) brother of the preceding, was born at Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1794. He graduated at Yale College in 1811, and about 1815 became editor of the "Boston Recorder," a religious journal. In 1823 he founded, conjointly with his brother, R. C. Morse, the "New York Observer." He was the author of several popular school geographies, and invented a new method of engraving maps, called cerography. Died in 1871.

Mortemart, de, dẽh mor'mȧr', (CASIMIR LOUIS VICTURNIEN de Rochechouart—dẽh rosh'shoo-ȧr',) DUC, a French general and diplomatist, born in Paris in 1787. During the revolution of July, 1830, Charles X. requested him to form a new cabinet, of which he was nominated president; but it was too late. He was afterwards, in 1831, ambassador to St. Petersburg, and was made a senator in 1852. Died January 1, 1875.

Mortier, mor'te-ā', (ÉDOUARD ADOLPHE CASIMIR JOSEPH,) afterwards Duke of Treviso, a celebrated marshal of France, born at Cateau-Cambrésis in 1768. He served with great distinction in the principal campaigns from 1792 to 1799, when he was made general of division. In 1803 he was sent by Napoleon to Hanover, of which he soon took possession. He was created a marshal in 1804, and the year following received the grand cordon of the legion of honour. Being appointed in 1805 to command a corps of the grand army in Germany, he was attacked in November by the Russian general Kootoosof with 30,000 men, against whom he made a most gallant defence with greatly inferior numbers until reinforcements came up. For the signal bravery he displayed at the battle of Friedland, June, 1807, he was made Duke of Treviso. In the Spanish campaign of 1808 he assisted at the siege of Saragossa, and defeated the Spaniards at Ocaña and Gebora. He accompanied Bonaparte to Russia in 1812, and was commissioned by him to blow up the Kremlin. In 1814, in conjunction with Marshal Marmont, he exerted himself to the utmost to defend Paris from the allies, but, not succeeding in this, gave in his adhesion to Louis XVIII. After the revolution of 1830 he entered the service of Louis Philippe, and in 1835, while accompanying that mon arch to a review, was one of the victims of Fieschi's "infernal machine."

Mor'tĭ-mẽr, (EDMUND,) Earl of March, an English nobleman, who married Philippa, only child of Lionel, Duke of Clarence. They had a son Roger, and were ancestors of Edward IV. Died in 1381.

Mortimer, (EDMUND,) fifth Earl of March, born about 1390, was the son of Roger, and grandson of the preceding. He was the lawful heir to the crown after the death of Richard II. Died in 1424.

Mortimer, (JOHN HAMILTON,) an English painter of history, born at Eastbourne, Sussex, in 1739. Among his works are "Saint Paul preaching to the Britons," and "King John signing Magna Charta." He was an inferior colorist, but his design was admired by his contemporaries. Died in 1779.

Mortimer, (ROGER,) Earl of March, the paramour of Isabella, Queen of England, born about 1287. Having been twice convicted of treason and pardoned by Edward II., he conspired with the queen against the life of the king, who was barbarously murdered. The guilty pair reigned for several years in the name of the young prince Edward III.; but Mortimer was at length made prisoner by order of the prince, and executed in 1330.

See HUME, "History of England:" FROISSART. "Chronicles."

Mortimer, (ROGER,) fourth Earl of March, was a son of the third earl. He died in 1398, leaving a son Edmund and a daughter Anne, who was married to Richard, Earl of Cambridge, and was a grandmother of Edward IV.

Mortimer, (THOMAS,) an English littérateur, born in London in 1730. He published "The British Plutarch," (6 vols., 1762,) "Elements of Commerce," etc., (1772,) "Compendium of History, Chronology, and Biography," (1777,) and other valuable works.

Morto da Feltre. See FELTRE, DA.

Mor'tŏn, (CHARLES,) a learned English Puritan minister, born about 1626. He was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, after which he taught school in London about twenty years. He emigrated to New England in 1686, and became minister at Charlestown, Massachusetts. He wrote several religious works. Died in 1698.

Morton, (CHARLES,) an English physician and antiquary, born in Westmoreland in 1716. Elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1752, he became one of its secretaries in 1760, and in 1776 succeeded Dr. Maty as librarian of the British Museum. He was also a member of the Imperial Academy of Saint Petersburg. He made several valuable contributions to the "Transactions" of the Royal Society. Died in 1799.

Mor'tŏn, (HENRY,) an American physicist, born in New York city, December 11, 1836. He graduated in 1857 at the University of Pennsylvania, where he became professor of chemistry in 1869. In 1870 he was chosen president of the Stevens Institute of Technology, at Hoboken. He has published many papers on chemistry and physics, and won a high reputation as an original investigator and as a teacher.

Mor'tŏn, (JAMES DOUGLAS,) EARL OF, Regent of Scotland, born in 1530, was a nephew of the Earl of Angus. He married Elizabeth, a daughter of James Douglas, third Earl of Morton, and inherited the earldom in 1553, at the death of the third earl, who left no male issue. He joined the Protestant party, and became one of the lords of the congregation about 1558. In 1563 he was appointed lord high chancellor of Scotland. He lost that office by his complicity in the assassination of Rizzio. He was invited by Bothwell to join him in the plot for the murder of Darnley. He declined to act in that affair, but failed to inform against Bothwell. For this course he afterwards offered the excuse that the queen was already aware of the plot, so that it would be useless to reveal the secret to her. He fought against Bothwell and the queen at Carbery Hill. In 1567 he was restored to the office of lord chancellor by Regent Murray. He was appointed regent of the kingdom in 1572, and rendered himself odious by his rapacity and oppressive acts, but was supported by Queen Elizabeth. Having been accused as an accessory to the murder of Darnley, he was convicted and beheaded in June, 1581.

See ROBERTSON, "History of Scotland;" BURTON, "History of Scotland."

Morton, (JAMES DOUGLAS,) EARL OF, a Scottish astronomer, born in Edinburgh in 1707, was a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and an associate of the Academy of Sciences, Paris. Died in 1768.

Mor'tŏn, (JAMES SAINT CLAIR,) an American general, born in Philadelphia in 1829, was a son of Dr. Samuel George Morton, noticed below. He was educated at West Point, where he graduated as second of his class in 1851, after which he was employed as engineer at various places. He was appointed chief engineer of the army of the Ohio in May, 1862, and commanded the Pioneer Brigade at the battle of Stone River, January 1–2, 1863. For his services in this action he obtained the rank of brigadier-general. He was killed in an assault on Petersburg in June, 1864.

Morton, (JOHN,) an English prelate and statesman, born in Dorsetshire in 1410. He held several high offices under Henry VI., and, soon after the accession of Edward IV., was appointed Bishop of Ely, and lord chancellor of England. He was imprisoned by Richard III., but, having effected his escape, repaired to the continent, where he is said to have formed the plan, in conjunction with Henry, Earl of Richmond, of uniting the parties of York and Lancaster by the marriage of Henry to the daughter of Edward IV. Under Henry VII., Morton was created Archbishop of Canterbury, (1486,) and a cardinal, (1493.) He was the patron of Sir Thomas More, who eulogized him in his "Utopia." Died in 1500.

Morton, (LEVI PARSONS,) an American merchant and banker, the son of a Congregational clergyman, was born at Shoreham, Vermont, May 16, 1824. In 1849 he engaged in mercantile business in Boston, but subsequently removed to New York, where, in 1863, he established the banking-house of L. P. Morton & Co. He was twice elected to Congress, (1878 and 1880,) and in 1881 was appointed by President Garfield minister to France. In 1888 he became the successful candidate for Vice-President on the Republican ticket with Harrison.

Morton, (MARCUS,) an American jurist and Governor, born at Freetown, Massachusetts, in 1784. He was a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts from 1825 to 1840, and was elected Governor of that State by the Democrats in 1840 and 1843. Died in 1864.

Morton, (NATHANIEL,) one of the early settlers of Plymouth, born in England in 1612, was the author of "New England's Memorial," and a "History of the Church at Plymouth." Died in 1685.

Morton, (OLIVER P.,) an American Senator, born in Wayne county, Indiana, in 1823. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. He was Governor of Indiana from 1861 to 1865, and was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of that State in January, 1867, for a term ending in March, 1873. During the civil war he was conspicuous for his zeal in the cause of his country. He died November 1, 1877

Morton, (RICHARD,) an English physician, born in Suffolk about 1635, had a high reputation for skill and learning, and became in 1670 physician to the Prince of Orange. He was the author of "Exercises on Phthisis," and other medical works, in Latin.

Morton, (SAMUEL GEORGE,) an eminent American naturalist, ethnologist, and physician, was born in Philadelphia, January 26, 1799. His father, George Morton, who was descended from a large and highly respectable family in Clonmel, Ireland, emigrated to America and engaged in mercantile pursuits. The subject of our sketch early evinced a passionate fondness for books and thirst for knowledge, and combined with these a habit of persevering and methodical industry. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in March, 1820, and in October of the same year entered as a matriculate the University of Edinburgh, the diploma of which institution was conferred upon him in August, 1823. He returned to America in 1824, commenced the practice of medicine in 1826, and in 1827 married Rebecca G., daughter of Robert and Elizabeth Pearsall, highly respected members of the Society of Friends. His first scientific essay, entitled "Observations on Cornine, a New Alkaloid," was published in the "Medical and Physical Journal" for 1825–26. In 1827 he communicated to the Academy of Natural Sciences an "Analysis of Tabular Spar from Bucks County, Pennsylvania, with a Notice of Various Minerals found in the same Locality." During the same year he contributed to the "Journal of the Academy of Natural Sciences," Philadelphia, a "Description of a New Species of Ostrea Convexa of Say." These papers were followed in rapid succession by many other scientific communications, and the Journal of the Academy continued to be enriched by his labours until within a short period of his death. There were not less than forty of these contributions, besides others published in the "Transactions of the American Philosophical Society," and the "American Journal of Science and Arts," edited by Professor Silliman. These articles, by their varied range, exhibited great versatility of talent, treating as they did upon subjects connected with anatomy, ethnology, archæology, geology, palæontology, zoology, and mineralogy. His celebrated monograph on the "Cretaceous Group of the United States" was received, at the time of its publication, with great favour by the most eminent geologists of Europe. In 1834 he contributed to medical literature an important work on the "Anatomical Character, Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment of Pulmonary Consumption." He early began to make his now celebrated collection of crania, and up to 1840 had, with great labour and cost, succeeded in collecting no less than 1468 crania. In 1839 he gave to the world his "Crania Americana," and in 1844 his "Crania Egyptiaca," both of which were very favourably received. He was for some years president of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences. He died in May, 1851. His name is often associated with Nott and Gliddon's "Types of Mankind," (1854,) based to some extent on Dr. Morton's researches; but that work, published after his death, and edited by those who very imperfectly understood his views, gives no just idea of the modest, impartial, and thoroughly scientific spirit with which he conducted all his inquiries. In the annals of science his name will always be associated with that of Blumenbach, the founder of human craniography. To this study he gave a powerful impetus, by demonstrating the precise method in accordance with which it should be pursued, and by indicating its capability of throwing light upon the origin and affiliations of the various races of men. Dr. Morton left several sons, of whom the eldest, an officer of great merit, died fighting bravely for his country, (see MORTON, JAMES SAINT CLAIR;) another son, THOMAS GEORGE, has become justly distinguished as one of the most skilful surgeons in the United States.

See GROSS's "American Medical Biography."

Morton, (THOMAS,) an English dramatist, born in Durham in 1764, was the author of numerous comedies and farces, which had great popularity in his time. His dramas entitled "Town and Country" and "A Roland for an Oliver" still retain their place on the stage. Died in 1838.

See BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Morton, (THOMAS,) an English prelate, born at York in 1564, became successively Bishop of Chester, of Lichfield, and of Durham. He published several controversial treatises against papists and nonconformists. He was an intimate friend of Casaubon, to whose memory he erected a monument in Westminster Abbey. Died in 1659.

See BARWICK, "Life of Thomas, Bishop of Durham," 1660; BADDILY and NAYLOR, "Life of Thomas Morton," 1669.

Morton, (THOMAS GEORGE,) M.D., a distinguished American surgeon, a son of S. G. Morton, already noticed, was born in Philadelphia, August 8, 1835. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, graduating as M.D. in 1856. He became a surgeon of his native city, and acquired a great reputation as a brilliant and skilful operator. He has published many reports and professional papers, and is the inventor of important surgical appliances.

Morton, (WILLIAM THOMAS GREEN,) M.D., an American dentist and physician, born at Charlton, Massachusetts, in 1819. He settled in Boston, as a dentist, about 1842, and made some improvements in the fabrication of artificial teeth. He afterwards studied medicine and chemistry, to which he was attracted by a desire to discover a substance that would render his patients insensible to painful operations on their teeth. He began to use sulphuric ether as an anæsthetic in 1846. His claim to this invention was disputed by Dr. Jackson. Died in July, 1868. (See WELLS, HORACE.)

Mortonval, mor'tôn'vȧl', the assumed name of Furcy Guesdon, (für'se' gȧ'dôn',) a French novelist, born in Paris about 1780. He wrote, besides other novels, "The Count of Villamayor," (1825.) Died in 1856.

Moser, (MARY,) daughter of George Michael Moser, noticed above, acquired great celebrity as a flower-painter. A room at Frogmore, which she adorned with flowers, is called "Miss Moser's room." She was chosen an Academician of the Royal Academy of London, and was the only lady besides Angelica Kauffman who ever received that honour. She became Mrs. Lloyd by marriage. Died in 1819.

Moser, von, fon mo'zẹr, (FRIEDRICH KARL,) a German jurist, born at Stuttgart in 1723, was a son of Johann Jakob Moser, noticed above. He was successively aulic councillor at Vienna, and member of the administration of Hesse-Darmstadt, (1770.) He published several legal works, a "History of the Waldenses," and "The Master and Servant," ("Der Herr und der Diener," 1759.) The last-named production, illustrating the duties of a sovereign and his minister, had great popularity. He was for some years editor of the "Patriotisches Archiv." Died in 1798.

Mo'ses, [Heb. מֹשֶׁה; Gr. Μωσῆς; Lat. MO'SES; Fr. MOYSE or MOÏSE, mo'ẹz'; It. MOISÈ, mo-e-sà'; Arabic, MOOSA, moo'sä,] an eminent Hebrew legislator and prophet, born in Egypt about 1570 B.C., was a son of Amram, of the tribe of Levi. In consequence of a royal edict that all male infants of the Hebrews should be killed, he was deposited by his mother in an ark or basket on the border of the Nile, and found by Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him as her son. He became "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and mighty in words and deeds," and about the age of forty began to meditate the liberation of the oppressed Hebrews. Having incurred the anger of the king by his active sympathy with his own race, he fled to Midian, where he served as a shepherd about forty years. He received a divine mission to bring the children of Israel out of Egypt to the land of Canaan. Under his guidance the chosen people passed through the Red Sea into the Wilderness. He was instrumental in composing for them a code of laws called by his name, and is the reputed author of the book of Genesis and other books of the Pentateuch. The form of government which he prescribed to the Hebrews was a theocracy. The fundamental principles of the Mosaic law were that man must worship the only true God exclusively, and love his neighbour as himself. Having appointed Joshua as his successor, and obtained a distant view of the promised land, Moses died on Mount Pisgah, aged about one hundred and twenty years. He was pre-eminent for meekness.

Motin, mo'tăN', (PIERRE,) a French poet, born at Bourges, lived about 1570–1600. He wrote a number of short poems, which are commended for grace and delicacy of sentiment.

Mot'ley, (JOHN LOTHROP,) an eminent American historian, born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, on the 15th of April, 1814. He graduated at Harvard in 1831, studied about a year in the University of Göttingen, and passed several years in visits to various countries of Europe. Having returned home, he studied law, which, however, he never practised to much extent. He published in 1839 a novel entitled "Morton's Hope, or the Memoirs of a Young Provincial." In 1840 he was appointed secretary of legation at Saint Petersburg, where he remained but a short time. He contributed articles to the "North American Review" and other periodicals, and produced in 1849 "Merry Mount, a Romance," which had little success. Having resolved to write a work on the history of Holland, he went to Europe in 1851 to collect materials and to make researches on that subject. He passed several years at Dresden, Berlin, and the Hague, and published "The Rise of the Dutch Republic: a History," (London, 3 vols. 8vo, 1856,) a work of great merit and profound research, which ran through several editions and was translated into French, Dutch, and German. Commenting on Prescott's "Philip II." and Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic," the "Edinburgh Review" of January, 1857, says, "They do honour to American literature, and they would do honour to any literature in the world." His next work—a continuation of the first—is entitled "The History of the United Netherlands from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort," (4 vols., 1860–67.)

"Mr. Motley's History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," says a critic in the "Quarterly Review" for January, 1861, "is already known and valued for the grasp of mind which it displays, for the earnest and manly spirit in which he has communicated the results of deep research and careful reflection. Again he appears before us, rich with the spoils of time, to tell the story of the United Netherlands from the death of William the Silent to the end of the eventful year of the Spanish Armada; and we still find him in every way worthy of this 'great argument.' . . . Many of Mr. Motley's characteristics as a historian will appear from the extracts which we have made. It will be seen how vividly he can depict the places, the men, the deeds, of other days. But the work itself must be read to appreciate the vast and conscientious industry which he has so lavishly bestowed upon it. . . . At the same time, be is not oppressed by his materials, but has sagacity to estimate their real value; and he has combined and arranged with scholarly power the facts which they contain."

In 1861 he was appointed minister-plenipotentiary to Austria, but resigned this position early in 1867, in consequence of an offensive letter addressed to him by Mr. Seward, secretary of state. In the spring of 1869 he was sent as ambassador to England by President Grant, but, his friends becoming involved in a quarrel with the administration, Mr. Motley, in July, 1870, was requested to resign. Refusing to comply with the request, he was formally recalled in the following November. He subsequently resided in England, and published the "Life of John of Barneveldt," (2 vols., 1874.) Died May 29, 1877.

Mott, (HENRY AUGUSTUS,) an American chemist, born on Staten Island, New York, in 1852. He was professor of chemistry in the New York Medical College for Women 1881–86. He published "Was Man Created?" (1880,) "Matter, Ether, and Energy," etc. Died in 1896.

Mott, originally Coffin, (LUCRETIA,) an American reformer and philanthropist, born on the island of Nantucket in 1793. About 1808 her parents, who were members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, removed to Philadelphia. In 1811 she was married to James Mott, of New York, who soon afterwards came to Philadelphia and entered into mercantile business with her father. While still very young, her attention had been called to the iniquity of slavery, and she felt it her duty to abstain from the products of slave labour. She travelled extensively as a minister, preaching the peculiar doctrines of the society in which she had been educated, inculcating obedience to the Divine light within the heart, and exposing the sinfulness of slavery and war. At the time of the separation in the Society of Friends, in 1827, she joined those popularly known as "Hicksites," (see HICKS, ELIAS,) and distinguished herself by the advocacy of Unitarian views of the most radical kind. She took an active part (1833) in the organization of the Anti-Slavery Society in Philadelphia, and in 1840 went as a delegate to the World's Anti-Slavery Convention, held in London; but, though otherwise treated with the greatest respect and courtesy, she was not admitted as a delegate, a majority of the convention having decided that women should be excluded from any active participation in the business of the assembly.

Mrs. Mott was long known as an earnest and eloquent advocate of anti-slavery principles, of the rights of women, and of other reformatory movements. As a speaker she was characterized by an unaffected simplicity and earnestness of manner, as well as by clearness and propriety of expression. Her high moral qualities, her uncommon intelligence, the beauty and consistency of her general character,—illustrated in her domestic as well as in her public life,—were such as to command the respect even of those who in opinion differed most widely from her in regard to religious and social questions. She died November 11, 1880.

Mott, (VALENTINE,) a famous American surgeon, born at Glen Cove, Long Island, New York, in August, 1785, was a son of Dr. Mott, of New York City. He graduated as M.D. at Columbia College in 1806, and afterwards pursued his studies in London and Edinburgh. He became professor of surgery in Columbia College, New York, about 1809. In 1826 he united with Dr. Hosack and others in founding Rutgers Medical College. He acquired a wide celebrity by his skill as an operator and by the original operations which he performed. It is said that he was the first that exsected the entire right clavicle, and that he tied the common carotid artery forty-six times. Sir Astley Cooper expressed the opinion that Dr. Mott "had performed more of the great operations than any man living." He was for many years professor of surgery and relative anatomy in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. Among his writings are "Travels in Europe and the East," (1842,) and "Mott's Cliniques," (1860.) Died in 1865.

Motte, de la, deh lȧ mot, (ANTOINE Houdart—hoo'dȧR,) a French critic and dramatist, born in Paris in 1672. He was the author of the dramas of "Semele," "The Triumph of the Arts," and "Inez de Castro," (1723.) The last-named was very successful. He translated Homer's "Iliad," which he abridged for the sake of improving it, and thus, in the words of Voltaire, "changed a form glowing with youth and health into a fleshless skeleton." Among his other works we may name his "Reflections on Criticism," (1715,) in which he maintains the superiority of the moderns over the ancients. It caused a great sensation, and excited against him no little hostility among the literati. His prose writings are esteemed models of elegant composition. La Motte had been chosen in 1710 a member of the French Academy, having Rousseau as his competitor. Died in 1731.

Motte-Cadillac, de la, deh lȧ mot kȧ'de'yȧk', (ANTOINE,) a French officer, noted as the founder of Detroit, was born in Gascony about 1660. He formed a settlement at Detroit in 1701, and was appointed Governor of Louisiana about 1711. Died after 1717.

In 1809 he was appointed by Napoleon secretary of his cabinet, and in this capacity accompanied him in his campaigns. He was also created a baron, and in 1812 master of requests. Died in 1843.

See PORTALIS, "Éloge de M. le Baron Mounier," 1844; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Mounier, (JEAN JOSEPH,) a French legislator, eminent for his talents and virtues, was born at Grenoble in 1758. He studied law, and, after he had served as judge for several years, was elected in 1789 to the States-General, where he distinguished himself by the moderation of his liberal opinions. He was chairman of the committee appointed to form a new constitution, but his plan was rejected. He wished a legislature divided into two chambers. He presided with credit over the National Assembly from September 28 to October 8, 1789, during which time the sessions of that body were disturbed by a mob, and then hastily retired from the capital. Being denounced as a royalist, he emigrated in 1790, and lived in Switzerland, England, and other countries, until 1801. Having returned to France, he was appointed in 1802 prefect of Ille-et-Vilaine, and about 1804 councillor of state. He died in 1806, leaving several able political works, one of which is "The Influence ascribed to the Philosophers and Free-Masons on the French Revolution."

Mozart, mo'zart', [Ger. pron. mōt'sȧrt,] (JOHANN CHRYSOSTOM WOLFGANG AMADEUS,) a celebrated German composer, born at Saltzburg on the 27th of January, 1756. Both his parents were distinguished for personal beauty. He began to perform on the harpsichord when he was about four years old, and manifested an exquisite musical organization. His first teacher was his father, who devoted much time to his education. At the age of six years he composed short pieces of music, and was regarded as a prodigy of musical genius. He had a sister four years his senior, who in early childhood was an excellent musician. In 1762 Leopold Mozart took Wolfgang and his sister to Munich, where they performed before the court and excited great admiration. They also visited Vienna, and exhibited their skill before the emperor and his family, by whom they were encouraged and caressed. In 1763 young Mozart excited the astonishment of the Parisians by his performance on the organ and by his talent for improvisation. He visited with his parents the principal cities of Germany, and published two of his compositions in 1763. The Mozart family passed the year 1764 in London, where they gave public concerts. About 1766 they returned to Saltzburg, where Wolfgang continued his studies, taking for models the productions of Handel and Emanuel Bach. He composed in 1768 an opera called "La Finta semplice," which was not represented. Accompanied by his father, he made the tour of Italy in 1769 and 1770, and was received with enthusiasm. He produced at Milan the opera of "Mitridate," which was performed with success in 1770. During his visit to Rome the pope created him a knight (cavaliere) of the Golden Spur. His next works were two serenatas, called "Ascanio in Alba," and "The Dream of Scipio," ("Il Sogno di Scipione," 1772.) He composed in 1773 an opera entitled "Lucio Silla," which was very successful. He passed several years in travel, and solicited employment in various foreign countries without success.

In 1779 he obtained the places of organist and chapelmaster to the Archbishop of Saltzburg. At the request of the Elector of Bavaria, he composed "Idomeneo," an opera, (1781,) which was superior to his former works and obtained immense applause. "This work," says Denne-Baron, "was nothing less than a complete transformation of the art." He quitted the service of the archbishop,—a coarse and sordid person, who required him to eat with his menial servants,—and in 1781 settled in Vienna. In 1782 he composed a German opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio," ("Die Entführung aus dem Serail,") and married Constance Weber. He became a friend of Haydn, the great composer.

Mozart composed, with unremitting activity and in rapid succession, symphonies, sonatas, quartets, motets, waltzes, etc. About 1785 he produced "Davidde penitente," an oratorio, which abounds in beauties of the first order. His comic opera "The Marriage of Figaro" ("Le Nozze di Figaro," 1786) was performed with unbounded applause, and, in the opinion of some critics, formed an epoch in dramatic music. His master-piece is the opera "Don Giovanni," or "Don Juan," which was first performed at Prague in 1787. The King of Prussia offered him 3000 crowns a year to attract him to Berlin; but he declined to quit the service of the emperor Joseph, who paid him only 800 florins. He was often reduced to painful distress for want of money while he lived in Vienna. Among his later works is "The Magic Flute," an opera, (1791.) Mozart, as a performer on the piano, surpassed all the German musicians of his time. His constitution was naturally delicate, and his health rapidly declined in 1791, during which he was employed to compose a requiem by a mysterious stranger, or a person who wished his name to be a secret. This person was an agent of Count Walsegg. To his morbid and depressed imagination this seemed as a warning of his own impending death. With this presentiment, he composed his "Requiem," which is considered his most sublime work. He died in Vienna, December 5, 1791, leaving several children.

"Mozart occupies," says Denne-Baron, "a unique place in the history of music, by the universality of his genius. . . . He excelled in all departments, and the products of his radiant imagination improved the art in all its parts. . . . In dramatic music he was undivalled. His enlightened mind and his exquisite sensibility enabled him to seize with equal tact and sagacity the nuances and the true conditions of the lyrical drama." ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.")

Müller, mül'ler, (OTHO FREDERIK,) an eminent Danish naturalist, born at Copenhagen in 1730. Being appointed in 1753 tutor to a young nobleman, he availed himself, while travelling with him, of the facilities for increasing his knowledge of botany and zoology. In 1764 he published his "Fauna Insectorum Friedrichsdaliana," and in 1767 his "Flora Friedrichsdaliana," giving an account of the insects and plants of Friedrichsdal. The great merit of these productions caused him to be appointed by King Frederick V. to continue the publication of the "Flora Danica," a magnificent work, surpassing anything of the kind that had hitherto appeared. Müller added two volumes to the three already published by Oeder. In 1773–74 he brought out a treatise (in Latin) "On Earth Worms and Fresh-Water Worms." In the first part of this work he describes the infusoria, of which he discovered many new species; and he was the first naturalist who distributed animalcules into genera and species. In 1781 his treatise "On the Hydrachnæ" appeared, and in 1785 one "On the Monoculi," both written in Latin and illustrated with many plates. These two works, together with a treatise on the Infusoria, (in 4to, with fifty plates,) published in 1786, are esteemed his greatest productions. Müller had begun in 1779 a "Zoologia Danica," a superb work, of which he published two parts, each with forty coloured plates. Several additions were made to it after his death, which took place in 1784. Müller is characterized by Cuvier as one of the most laborious and accurate observers of the eighteenth century; and the same writer adds, "The Infusoria form, as it were, a new animal kingdom, which he revealed to the world."

Murat, [sometimes Anglicized in pronunciation as mu-rȧt',] (JOACHIM,) a celebrated marshal of the French empire, and King of Naples, was born near Cahors, in the south of France, in 1771. His father was an innkeeper. Soon after the Revolution began, young Murat entered the guard of Louis XVI., from which he passed into a regiment of chasseurs. As he was a warm partisan of the popular cause, he was rapidly promoted, and in the campaign of 1796 was a favourite aide-de-camp of Bonaparte, whose fortunes he thenceforth followed and shared. Having signalized his impetuous bravery in the campaigns of Italy and Egypt, he was made a general of division in 1799. Soon after Bonaparte obtained the chief power, he gave to Murat his sister Caroline in marriage. Murat commanded the cavalry at Marengo in 1800, and was appointed governor of Paris in 1804, with the rank of general-in-chief. He received a marshal's bâton in 1804, and in 1806 was created Grand Duke of Berg and Cleves. At Austerlitz, Jena, and Eylau he directed the cavalry with brilliant effect. He was pronounced by Napoleon "the best cavalry officer in Europe," and was admired for his handsome figure, gorgeous costume, and chivalrous demeanour.

Murat commanded the army which invaded Spain in 1808, and in the same year was placed on the throne of Naples, where he was received with general joy, and reigned liberally and peacefully until 1812. He shared the reverses of the Russian campaign, (1812,) and in 1813 again fought for Napoleon, whose cause he deserted after the battle of Leipsic. He made a treaty with the court of Vienna in January, 1814, and engaged to support the allies with his army; but he failed to aid them efficiently, and was accused of duplicity. As the Congress of Vienna appeared indisposed to recognize his claim, he secretly renewed his relations with the exiled emperor, whose cause he openly espoused in March, 1815. Calling the Italians to rise for liberty, he commenced hostilities against the Austrians in Northern Italy, but was repulsed and finally defeated at Macerata in May, and then fled to France. In October, 1815, he landed with about thirty men in his former kingdom, and made a desperate attempt to recover it, but was soon captured and shot. As a ruler, he appears to have been mild and humane, but he was deficient in political ability as well as moral courage. His wife survived him many years, and took the title of Countess of Lipano. (See BONAPARTE, CAROLINE.) Murat left two sons, Napoléon Achille and Lucien Charles Joseph.

He was educated at the Military College of Marlow, entered the army in 1807, and served in several battles in the Peninsula. He was also on the staff of his uncle, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in Sicily. He married a daughter of General Hugonin in 1815, and quitted the army about 1816. By the advice of Sir Humphry Davy, he applied himself to the study of natural science, and attended lectures at the Royal Institution. About 1825 he produced a "Geological Sketch of the Northwestern Extremity of Sussex." He became a member of the Geological Society in 1825, and of the Royal Society in 1826. In company with Sir Charles Lyell, he explored in 1828 the geology of Auvergne, Provence, and Piedmont, on which they wrote jointly three memoirs. In 1830 he began to examine the older sedimentary strata of England and Wales, to which he gave the name of Silurian system. He published the results of these researches in an important work entitled "The Silurian System." He was the first who discovered the relations of these palæozoic strata and classified them according to the succession of organic remains. In 1845 Mr. Murchison and M. de Verneuil published "The Geology of Russia and the Ural Mountains," (2 vols. 4to.) The former received the honour of knighthood in 1846. He was elected president of the Royal Geographical Society in 1844 and 1852, and received the Copley medal in 1849, for the establishment of the Silurian system. Among his numerous works is "Siluria: the History of the oldest known Rocks containing Organic Remains, with a Brief Sketch of the Distribution of Gold over the Earth," (1854.) He had been chosen president of the Geological Society several times between 1830 and 1842.

In 1855 he was appointed Director-General of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom. He was elected president of the Royal Geographical Society in 1864, and received the Copley medal in 1866. Died in 1871.

He served in Flanders and Egypt with distinction, and rendered important services as quartermaster-general in the Peninsular war, (1808–14,) after which he was employed in France as lieutenant-general of the army of occupation. He was appointed governor of the Royal Military College at Woolwich about 1819, and secretary of state for the colonies in 1828. In 1841 he became master-general of the ordnance. Died in 1846.

Murray, (Hugh,) a Scottish geographer and miscellaneous writer, born in East Lothian in 1779. Among his principal works are "Discoveries and Travels in America," (1829,) "Encyclopædia of Geography," (1834,) and "History of British India." Died in 1846.

See "Quarterly Review" for January, 1821.

Murray, (James Augustus Henry,) a British philologist, born in 1837. He won reputation as a philologist by his "Dialects of the Southern Counties of Scotland," (1873,) and in 1879 began the great task of editing the Philological Society's New English Dictionary.

Murray or Moray, (James Stuart,) Earl of, often called Regent Murray, born about 1533, was a natural son of James V. of Scotland and Margaret Erskine. In 1558 he joined the "Lords of the Congregation," as the Protestant chiefs styled themselves, and in 1560 was sent to France to invite Queen Mary (his half-sister) to return to her kingdom. She returned in 1561, and he became her most favoured and powerful minister, and was made Earl of Murray. His talents, firmness, and courage had already caused the Reformers to regard him as the head of their party. The marriage of Mary with Darnley, (1565,) against the advice of Murray, caused a breach between him and the queen, which was afterwards greatly widened by the countenance she showed to Darnley's murderers. Mary having been deposed, he was appointed regent of the kingdom in August, 1567. In 1568 she escaped from Lochleven Castle, and raised an army, which was quickly routed by the regent at Langside. At the trial of Mary, which Queen Elizabeth instituted, the regent appeared as evidence against the captive queen. By this and other acts he had incurred the bitter hatred of the queen's party, and they resolved upon his destruction. In January, 1570, he was waylaid, shot, and mortally wounded by James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh, a notorious desperado, who was afterwards selected by the agents of Philip II. to assassinate the Prince of Orange.

The character of the regent Murray has been estimated very differently, according to the temper or prejudice of those who have judged him. By his firmness, moderation, humanity, and impartial justice, he appears to have well deserved the title of "the Good Regent," by which he was known among the people of Scotland. "Those," observes Froude, "who can see only in the Protestant religion an uprising of Antichrist, and in the Queen of Scots the beautiful victim of sectarian iniquity, have exhausted upon Murray the resources of eloquent vituperation, and have described him as a perfidious brother, building up his own fortunes on the wrongs of his injured sovereign. . . . But facts prevail at last, however passionate the predilection; and, when the verdict of plain human sense can get itself pronounced, the 'good regent' will take his place among the best and greatest men who have ever lived."

Murray, (Johan Anders,) a Swedish physician and botanist, born at Stockholm in 1740, was a pupil of Linnæus. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Stockholm, and of the Royal Society of Göttingen, and was created a privy councillor by the King of England. Linnæus gave the name of Murraya exotica to an East Indian tree. He was a brother of Adolphus, noticed above. Died in 1791.

See C. G. Heyne, "Elogium J. A. Murray," 1791.

Murray, (John,) a Scottish physician, published a "System of Materia Medica and Pharmacy," and "Elements of Chemistry." Died in 1820.

Murray, (JOHN,) a celebrated divine and preacher, born in Hampshire, England, in 1741, is regarded as the founder of Universalism in America. Having emigrated to the United States in 1770, he was appointed in 1775 a chaplain in the army. He took part in the proceedings of the Universalist Convention in 1785, and subsequently became pastor of a church in Boston. Died in 1815.

See "Records of the Life of John Murray," written by himself.

Murray, (JOHN,) an eminent English publisher, born in London in 1778. He commenced in 1803 a career of publication which is perhaps unrivalled in the annals of literature. About 1807 he projected the "Quarterly Review," in which he obtained the co-operation of Canning and Scott, and published the first number in 1809. His sagacity in discerning the merits or talents of authors, and his tact in anticipating the wants of the public, rendered him very successful. He was a liberal patron of literature, and a generous friend to Byron and other eminent authors. Died in 1843.

Murray, (JOHN,) biologist, was born at Coburg, Canada, in 1841. He was one of the naturalists on the Challenger expedition, and in 1882 became editor-in-chief of the "Challenger Reports." He wrote a "Narrative" of the expedition, and has published very numerous scientific papers.

Murray, (LINDLEY,) a distinguished American grammarian and educational writer, born near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, in 1745, was a member of the Society of Friends. Having removed at an early age to New York, he studied law, but he subsequently engaged in mercantile pursuits. The latter part of his life was spent in England, to which he removed about 1784. Among his works, which obtained great popularity both in England and America, we may name his "Power of Religion on the Mind," etc., (1787,) "Grammar of the English Language," (1795,) "English Reader," "Introduction to the English Reader," and "Duty and Benefit of a Daily Perusal of the Holy Scriptures," (1817.) He also compiled several French readers. He died near York, England, in 1826.

Murray, (NICHOLAS,) D.D., a Presbyterian divine, born in Ireland in 1803, studied theology at Princeton, New Jersey, and in 1834 became pastor at Elizabethtown, in that State. He published several theological works. His "Letters to Bishop Hughes," (1847–48,) under the signature of KIRWAN, have enjoyed a great popularity, and have been translated into several foreign languages. Died in 1861.

Murray, (PATRICK,) a Scottish writer, born in 1703, was the fifth Lord Elibank. He published an "Inquiry into the Origin and Consequence of the Public Debts," "Thoughts on Money, Circulation," etc., and a "Letter to Lord Hailes on his Remarks on the History of Scotland." His writings were highly esteemed. Died in 1778.

Murray, (Sir ROBERT.) See MORAY.

Murray, (WILLIAM,) Earl of Mansfield, lord chief justice, a British lawyer and orator of great merit and celebrity, was born at Perth, Scotland, in 1704. He was a younger son of Andrew, Viscount Stormont. Having gained distinction as a classical scholar at Oxford, and enlarged his mind by foreign travel, he was called to the bar in 1731. He speedily rose into extensive practice, and in 1743 was appointed solicitor-general. About this time he entered the House of Commons, where he was successful as an elegant and persuasive speaker, and defended the government when Mr. Pitt (Lord Chatham) was the leader of the opposition. "He surpassed Pitt," says Macaulay, "in correctness of taste, in power of reasoning, in depth and variety of knowledge; but he wanted the energy, the courage, the all-grasping and all-risking ambition which make men great in stirring times." ("Review of the Life of the Earl of Chatham.") He was appointed attorney-general in 1754, and chief justice of the king's bench in 1756. Over that great court he presided with honour above thirty years. In 1756 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Mansfield. On more than one occasion he refused high political positions, among which was that of lord chancellor. He had, however, a seat in the cabinet for more than a year. In the trial of Woodfall for publishing "Junius's Letters," Lord Mansfield gave offence to the popular party, and was censured for leaning against the freedom of discussion in cases of libel. During the riots of 1780, his house in London was burned down by a mob. He died, without issue, in 1793. "His mind and his habits," says Lord Brougham, "were eminently judicial; and it may be doubted if, taking both the externals and the more essential qualities into the account, that go to form a great judge, any one has ever administered the laws in this country whom we can fairly name as his equal."

Musæ, mū'zē, [Gr. Μοῦσαι,] the Muses, sometimes called PIER'IDES, in the Greek mythology, the daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, (Memory,) were supposed to preside over poetry, the liberal arts, and the sciences. According to the generally received opinion, there were nine Muses, namely, Calliope, Clio, Euterpe, Erato, Melpomene, Polyhymnia, Terpsichore, Thalia, and Urania. (See these names under their separate heads.) The places especially consecrated to the Muses were Mount Parnassus, Mount Helicon, and the fountains of Castalia and Aganippe.

Musaeus. See MUSÄUS.

Musæus, mu-zee'us, [Gr. Μουσαῖος; Fr. MUSÉE, mü'zȧ',] a celebrated and ancient Greek bard, commonly regarded as a semi-fabulous personage. He was said to be the son of Eumolpus and Selene, or, according to others, of Orpheus, of whom he was a disciple. Tradition informs us that he presided over the Eleusinian mysteries in the time of Hercules. He was the reputed author of several poetical works, among which were "Oracles," and a hymn to Ceres. Pausanias regarded this hymn as the only genuine poem of Musæus that was extant in his time. Onomacritus collected the Oracles of Musæus and mixed with them some of his own productions, which he wished to pass for the work of Musæus. For this imposture he was banished by Hipparchus, the son of Pisistratus.

See VIRGIL, "Æneid," book vi. 666; ULRICI, "Geschichte der Hellenischen Dichtkunst."

Musæus, surnamed GRAMMAT'ICUS, or "the Grammarian," is supposed to have lived in the fifth century. He is celebrated for his poem of "Hero and Leander," a production of rare merit, of which several good editions have been published.

Nâdir Shâh, nā'dir shāh, written also Nader Chah, Nadir Schah, and Nauder Shah, also called Koolee (or Kouli) Khân, koo'lee kăn, a celebrated Persian conqueror, of Turkish extraction, born in Khorassân in 1688. His courage and abilities early gained him distinction in the service of the governor of that province; but, in consequence of ill treatment, he left Khorassân and became the head of a band of robbers. Being soon after called upon by Tahmasp, Shah of Persia, to oppose the Afghans, he succeeded, within two years, in expelling them from the country, upon which he was made commander-in-chief, (1729.) Tahmasp having in 1732 made a disadvantageous treaty with Turkey, Nâdir resolved to prosecute the war, and gained such popularity by the success of his arms that on his return he dethroned the Shah and assumed the supreme power. In 1738 he conquered Candahar and Afghanistan. Having soon after invaded India, he entered Delhi in 1739, and took possession of the imperial treasures. The inhabitants, on a false report of Nâdir's death, attacked his soldiers. After an ineffectual attempt to restrain them, he ordered a wholesale massacre, in which, it is stated by Fraser, 120,000 perished. His many acts of tyranny and cruelty at length caused him to be assassinated, (1747.) In the early part of his career Nâdir Shah appears to have been not only an able, but, on the whole, a just and humane, prince; but later in life, having become a prey to avarice and suspicion, his acts, it is said, "exceeded in barbarity all that has been recorded of the most bloody tyrants."

Nannoni, nȧn-no'nee, (ANGELO,) an eminent Italian surgeon, born at Florence in 1715. He became professor and chief surgeon in the Hospital of Florence. His success as an operator and as a lecturer attracted patients and pupils from the most distant parts of Europe. He wrote several esteemed works, among which is "Della Semplicità del Medicare," (1761–67.) Died in 1790.

See AGOSTINO NANNONI, "Elogio del Professore A. Nannoni," 1790.

Nan'sen, (FRIDTIOF,) a distinguished Arctic explorer, born near Christiania, Norway, in 1861. His first notable exploit was a daring journey across Greenland in 1888. It was followed by an attempt to reach the pole, on the original plan of letting his ship freeze into the ice and drift northward with the supposed Arctic current. He started with the Fram, built especially for this voyage, in 1893, and in 1895 reached the latitude of 86° 14′, much the highest then attained. He left the ship and returned with a companion over the ice to Franz-Josef Land, where he wintered, and was rescued by Mr. Jackson in the spring of 1896. He was received in Europe with high honours, and made professor of zoology in the Christiania University. He published "The First Crossing of Greenland," "Esquimaux Life," and "Farthest North," (1897.)

Nansouty, de, dẹh nôN'soo'te', (ÉTIENNE ANTOINE MARIE Champion—shôN'pe-ôN',) COUNT, a French general, born at Bordeaux in 1768. He was made a general of brigade about 1798, and a general of division in 1803. According to Châteaubriand, he was one of the best cavalry officers that the war of the Revolution produced. The same writer states that he completed the victory at Austerlitz, (1805,) and commenced that of Wagram, (1809.) He was wounded at Borodino, (1812,) and commanded the cavalry at Leipsic. In 1814 he entered the service of the restored Bourbons. Died in February, 1815.

Nanteuil, (CHARLES FRANÇOIS Lebœuf—lẹh'bŭf',) a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1792. He gained the grand prize in 1817. Among his works is "Eurydice Dying." Died November 2, 1865.

Nanteuil, (ROBERT,) a French artist, born at Rheims in 1630, painted excellent portraits in pastel, but was chiefly distinguished as an engraver. Among his master-pieces are the portraits of the secretary of state, Simon Arnaud de Pomponne, and Van Steenbergen, the Dutch advocate. In the department of portrait-engraving Nanteuil has never been surpassed. He was designer and cabinet engraver to Louis XIV. Died in 1678.

Nantigny or Nantigni, de, dẹh nôN'tèn'ye', (LOUIS CHASOT,) a French writer on genealogy, was born in Burgundy in 1692. He published "Historical Genealogies of Kings, Emperors, and Sovereign Houses," and other works of the kind. Died in 1755.

Naoroji, now'ro-jee, (DADABHAI,) an East Indian, born at Bombay in 1825. He became distinguished as a reformer, was prime minister to the Prince of Baroda in 1874, and became a Liberal member of the English Parliament in 1892. He wrote many works on topics relating to India.

Nā'pĭ-er, (Sir CHARLES JAMES,) a British general, born at Whitehall in 1782, was the son of the Hon. George Napier and Lady Sarah Lennox, a daughter of the Duke of Richmond. He was a cousin of Admiral Charles John Napier, and a brother of Sir William, the historian. He gained the rank of major in 1806, was wounded in several actions in Spain between 1808 and 1812, became lieutenant-colonel in 1811, and was employed in ravaging the coasts of the United States in 1813–14. He acted with credit for several years as Governor of Cephalonia, from which he was recalled in 1830. Having risen to the rank of major-general, he was appointed commander of the army in Bengal in 1841. He increased his reputation by the conquest of Sinde, (1843,) in which he performed several exploits that were highly extolled. His efforts to reform the civil administration of Sinde are also commended. He returned to England in 1847, and was again sent to India in 1849, to oppose the Sikhs, but on his arrival found that the war was ended. In 1850 he returned home. He was the author of "Lights and Shadows of Military Life," and other works. Died in 1853.

See Sir W. F. P. Napier, "Life and Opinions of Sir Charles J. Napier;" "Blackwood's Magazine" for July and August, 1857.

Nā'pĭ-er, (Sir Charles John,) K.C.B., an eminent British admiral, born in Stirling county, Scotland, in 1786, was the son of the Hon. C. Napier, of Merchiston Hall, Scotland, and a descendant of the inventor of logarithms. He entered the navy in 1799, and, after fighting in several actions with the French, distinguished himself at Baltimore and other places in the United States in 1813 and 1814. After 1814 he passed about fifteen years in inaction, on half-pay. He commanded the Portuguese fleet which in 1833 gained a decisive victory over the fleet of Don Miguel, for which he was made a Portuguese grandee of the first class. As second in command, Captain Napier served with distinction at the reduction of Acre, in 1840, and was rewarded with the title of knight commander of the Bath. In 1841 he became rear-admiral, and commanded the Channel fleet for several years. He advocated naval reform in letters which were printed, and as a member of Parliament supported liberal, or rather radical, measures. After the commencement of the Russian war, he was appointed commander of the Baltic fleet, (1854,) and proposed to take Cronstadt, but found it too well fortified, and returned without any remarkable achievement. After his return to Parliament, in 1855, he imputed his failure to the fault of the ministers. He attained the rank of admiral in 1858. Died in November, 1860. "In his name is summed up all that he was. A Napier is a man possessed of high spirits, immense courage, great ingenuity, and prodigious egotism." ("London Times," November, 1860.)

See General E. Napier, "Life and Correspondence of Admiral Sir Charles J. Napier," 1861.

Napier, (Francis,) Lord, a British diplomatist, a son of the eighth Baron Napier, was born in 1819. He became minister-plenipotentiary to the United States about 1856. In December, 1860, he was appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the court of Russia, and in 1864 was transferred to Berlin. In 1866 he became Governor of Madras. Died December 19, 1898.

Napier, (Henry Edward,) an English naval officer and writer, born in 1789, was a brother of Sir Charles James Napier. He published "Florentine History from the Earliest Authentic Records," (6 vols., 1847.) Died in 1853.

Napier, written also Naper, Neper, or Nepair, [Lat. Napie'rus,] (John,) Baron of Merchiston, a Scottish mathematician, celebrated as the inventor of logarithms, was born at Merchiston Castle, near Edinburgh, in 1550. He was the son of Sir Archibald Napier, master of the mint. He entered the University of Saint Andrew's about 1563, and a few years later travelled in France, Germany, and Italy. He appears to have returned about 1571, after which he devoted himself to mathematics, theology, and literature. In 1593 he published an ingenious work called "A Plain Discovery of the Revelation of Saint John," in which he labours to prove that popery is antichristian. It is probable that prior to 1594 he began the train of inquiry which resulted in the discovery of logarithms. His tables were first published in 1614, with the title of "The Description of the Wonderful Law of Logarithms," ("Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio.") "The invention of logarithms," says Hallam, "is one of the rarest instances of sagacity in the history of mankind; and it has been justly noticed as remarkable that it issued complete from the mind of its author, and has not received any improvement since his time." In solving the problems of trigonometry, this invention is of immense utility, as it reduces the labour of months to a few days, and liberates the operator from the errors which are almost inevitable in long calculations. He died in 1617, leaving several sons, the eldest of whom, named Archibald, was raised to the peerage in 1627, with the title of Lord Napier.

Nā'pĭ-er, (Joseph,) an Irish lawyer and politician, born at Belfast in 1804. He was called to the bar in 1831, and elected to Parliament for the University of Dublin in 1848. He became attorney-general for Ireland in 1852, and was lord chancellor of Ireland from March, 1858, to June, 1859. Died December 9, 1882.

Napier, (Macvey,) a Scottish editor, born in the county of Stirling in 1776. He became professor of conveyancing in the University of Edinburgh. He edited the seventh edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and succeeded Lord Jeffrey as editor of the "Edinburgh Review" in 1829. He performed the duties of this position with ability for about eighteen years. Among his contributions to the "Edinburgh Review" is an article on "Raleigh," (April, 1840.) Died in 1847.

See "Notice of Macvey Napier," London, 1847; Chambers, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement.)

Napier, (Mark,) a Scottish antiquary, born in 1798. He wrote "Memorials and Letters of the Time of John Grahame of Claverhouse," a "Life of Napier of Merchistoun," (1834,) a "Life of Montrose," (1840,) and other works. Died at Edinburgh, November 23, 1879.

Napier, (Robert,) a Scottish mechanical engineer, distinguished for the construction of steamships, was born at Dumbarton in 1791. He served an apprenticeship to a blacksmith, and in 1815 became master of a smithery in Glasgow. A few years later he began to make engines for steamboats, and afterwards became the head of the large establishment of Robert Napier & Sons, of Glasgow. He constructed the machinery of the British Queen, and about 1840 furnished Mr. Cunard with four steamships which plied between England and the United States. In 1856 he built the Persia, which was perhaps unrivalled in strength and speed, and subsequently built several iron-clad ships for the navy. Died June 23, 1876.

Napier, (Sir Robert,) a British general, born in Ceylon about 1810. He served as an officer of the army in India, and became chief engineer of Bengal. During the Sepoy mutiny of 1857–58 he rendered important services as military engineer. He commanded an expedition sent against Abyssinia about the close of 1867. He gained a decisive victory at Magdala in April, 1868, over King Theodore, (who was killed,) and was rewarded with the title of Lord Napier. Died January 14, 1890.

Napier, (Sir William Francis,) a British general, famous as the historian of the Peninsular war, was born at Castletown, Kildare county, Ireland, in 1785. He was a brother of General Charles James Napier, and cousin of Admiral Charles J. Napier. He entered the army in 1800, and obtained the rank of captain in 1804. From 1808 to 1814 he served in the Peninsular war, during which he was frequently wounded. He received medals for his conduct at Salamanca, (1812,) and at the battles of the Nivelle and Orthes, etc., and became lieutenant-colonel in 1813. In 1828 he produced the first volume of his "History of the War in the Peninsula from 1807 to 1814," (6 vols.,) which was finished in 1840, and found its way to the summit of public favour, although its tenor was not in accordance with the popular and political prejudices of the times. He disapproved the policy of the English government, and estimated with candour the acts of Napoleon and his army. The work is admired for dignity of tone, fidelity to truth, and beauty of style. He was made major-general in 1841, and lieutenant-general in 1851. His wife was a daughter of General H. E. Fox, a relative of Lord Holland. Sir William published a "History of the Conquest of Scinde," and a few other works. Died in February, 1860.

Na-po'le-on [Fr. Napoléon, nâ'po'là'ôn'] III., (Charles Louis Napoléon Bonaparte,) Emperor of France, a son of Louis Bonaparte and Hortense de Beauharnais, was born at Paris, in the Tuileries, April 20, 1808. He was inscribed at the head of the register of the family of the Napoleonic dynasty, the emperor having recognized Louis and his heirs as successors to the crown in preference to his elder brothers. His mother, being compelled to quit France in 1815, took this son with her in her exile, and gave him for preceptors P. Lebas and Colonel Armandi. He passed several years of his youth at Arenenberg, in the Swiss canton of Thurgau. On the accession of Louis Philippe, in 1830, Louis Napoleon requested permission to return to France, which was not granted. He and his brother then went to Italy and enlisted in the army of insurgents, who at first gained some advantages over the papal troops, but were defeated and dispersed by the Austrians in 1831. On the death of the Duc de Reichstadt, in 1832, Louis Napoleon became a pretender to the throne of France. He published a work entitled "Political Reveries," and a "Manual of Artillery," (1836.) His ambition, his name, and his unscrupulous audacity urged him to enter a career which presents the most wonderful vicissitudes of fortune. Having secured the aid of Colonel Vaudrey and other officers stationed at Strasbourg, he made an attempt on that place, with a few adherents, in October, 1836. He failed, was arrested, and was banished or transported to the United States in November of that year.

In 1837 he returned to Europe, attended Queen Hortense in her last illness at Arenenberg, and took refuge in England, where he passed about two years. In 1839 he published his "Napoleonic Ideas," ("Idées Napoléoniennes,") which has been described as a "mélange of liberal principles and prætorian domination." It is an apology for the régime of Napoleon I. The unpopular measures of Louis Philippe encouraged Louis Napoleon to engage in another rash and desperate enterprise. Attended by about fifty partisans and a tame eagle, which was expected to perch upon his banner as the harbinger of victory, he sailed from England in August, 1840, and entered Boulogne, where he obtained but little support, and was speedily arrested by the soldiers who he had hoped would be induced to join his standard. He was tried on a charge of treason by the House of Peers, and, after he had made a speech in his own defence and professed his devotion to the principle of popular sovereignty, was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He was confined in the Castle of Ham, where he pursued his political studies and wrote several political and historical treatises. Aided by his physician, Dr. Conneau, and disguised as a labourer, he escaped from Ham in May, 1846, and retired to England.

The revolution of 1848 afforded him an opportunity to return to France, and thus opened a new field to his irrepressible ambition. In June, 1848, he was elected to the National Assembly for the department of the Seine. He was excluded from that body by Lamartine and his colleagues for a time, but he took his seat in September, 1848, and became a candidate for the office of president of France. On the 10th of December, 1848, he was elected president for four years, having received 5,562,834 votes. His chief competitor was General Cavaignac, who obtained 1,469,166 votes. He soon became involved in a contest with the Constituent Assembly, the republican majority of which regarded him with hostility or suspicion. In April, 1849, he sent an army to Rome to intervene in favour of the pope, who had been expelled by the republicans. The French army took Rome, and continued to occupy that city until 1866.

The Constituent Assembly dissolved itself, and was succeeded by the Legislative Assembly in May, 1849. The president appointed the celebrated De Tocqueville minister of foreign affairs in June, 1849. This minister, perceiving that the president expected him and his colleagues to be the pliant instruments of his will, resigned in October of that year. De Tocqueville afterwards remarked, "We were not the men to serve him on those terms." Louis Napoleon encountered a strong opposition in the Legislative Assembly, which in May, 1850, restricted universal suffrage and ordered that a residence of three years in a commune must be a qualification of voters. A long and violent struggle between the president and the representatives of the people was terminated by the coup d'état of December 2, 1851. Having secured the support of the army, by a reckless violation of his plighted faith he raised himself to the supreme power. The Assembly was forcibly dissolved, and the leading statesmen were arrested. Legislators and felons, statesmen and vulgar culprits, were huddled together in the same vehicle and conveyed to prison. Before the end of the year his acts were ratified by the form of a popular election, and he was chosen president for a term of ten years. A new constitution was adopted in January, 1852, and the legislative functions were divided between two houses, the Senate and the Corps Législatif, which, however, were so organized that they offered little or no check to his absolute power. The question whether he should take the title of emperor was submitted to the vote of the people in November, 1852, when, according to the official report, 7,824,189 voted in the affirmative. He assumed the title of Napoleon III., and married a Spanish lady of great personal attractions, Eugénie Marie de Guzman, Countess de Teba, in January, 1853. Having formed an alliance with England and publicly announced that his policy was peace, he, in conjunction with his new ally declared war against Russia in March, 1854, and sent an army to the Crimea. After a long siege, the allies took Sevastopol in September, 1855, and the war was ended by the treaty of Paris in March, 1856. Among the events of this year was the birth of the prince imperial, Napoléon Eugène Louis, etc.

One great aim of Napoleon III. appears to have been to reconcile the French people to the loss of liberty by promoting their material prosperity, by splendid public improvements, and by gratifying their passion for military glory. Accordingly, as an ally of the King of Sardinia in the war caused by the aggressions of Austria, he led a large army into Italy in May, 1859. He commanded in person at the battle of Solferino, where the Austrians were defeated, June 24, 1859, and in the next month concluded the peace of Villafranca. (See Francis Joseph.) Among the results of this war was the cession of Nice and Savoy to France by the King of Sardinia, who had extended his own dominions by the conquest of Lombardy. In 1861 he availed himself of the opportunity presented by the breaking out of the civil war in America, to intervene in Mexico, and fitted out against that republic an expedition which landed a well-appointed army under General Forey early in 1862. After several victories over the Mexican Liberals, the French forces entered the city of Mexico in June, 1863. Napoleon offered the imperial crown of Mexico to Maximilian of Austria, who accepted the fatal gift and was supported by a part of the native population. The United States refused to acknowledge the Mexican emperor, and intimated to Napoleon that European powers would not be permitted to establish monarchies by arms in North America. He accordingly withdrew his army from Mexico about the end of 1866, so that the result of the Mexican enterprise was the reverse of glorious for France. It is well understood that he sympathized with the slaveholders in their war against the Union, at least so far as they sought the disruption of the confederation.

Before the commencement of the American war, Napoleon was justly regarded as the most adroit and most successful sovereign in Europe. But his prestige was greatly impaired by the events of 1866. He remained neutral in the war between Austria and Prussia, which war he probably might have prevented; but in the diplomatic contest which ensued between France and Prussia be appears to have found more than a match in the genius of Count Bismarck, who suddenly raised Prussia to the rank of a first-rate power and united the Germans in a determined attitude against tbe aggressiveness of France. The French felt themselves humiliated by the fact that so great changes in the map of Europe should have been effected without their agency or concurrence, and condemned the policy by which France was isolated and excluded from the hope of extension towards the Rhine. After the battle of Sadowa, July 3, 1866, Napoleon offered himself as a mediator between the belligerent powers. The Emperor of Austria ceded to him Venetia, instead of surrendering it to the King of Italy, to whom it seemed naturally to belong. About the 10th of December, 1866, the French army was withdrawn finally from Rome, and the pope, finding himself in a critical position, addressed to Napoleon language which was far from complimentary. Napoleon and Bismarck were involved in a dispute about Luxemburg, which the former purchased of the King of Holland; but the Prussians occupied a strong fortress in that province, which they refused to relinquish. It was generally believed that war was imminent; but the difficulty was settled by a European Convention which met in London in May, 1867, and decided that neither France nor Prussia should retain possession of Luxemburg.

The exciting and warmly-contested elections of May and June, 1869, showed so great an increase of votes against imperial despotism, that Napoleon thought it expedient to make large concessions to the people and the legislative body. He gave the latter the right to elect its own officers, to have partial control over the expenditure of the public money, the right of interpellation. and tbe privilege to sharo with himself the power of initiating laws. He proclaimed a general amnesty for political offences in August, 1869. In December of that year he appointed Émile Ollivier prime minister, and requested him to form a cabinet. "Designate persons," he said, "who will, associated with yourself, form a homogeneous cabinet faithfully representing the legislative majority." This was regarded as the end of personal government in France, and the beginning or restoration of a constitutional régime. He addressed to prime minister Ollivier, March 22, 1870, an important letter, in which he says, "I think it opportune, under present circumstances, to adopt all the reforms required by the constitutional government of the Empire, in order to put an end to the immoderate desire for change which prevails in certain minds." He afterwards issued an address and appeal to the people, asking their votes, in these terms: "Do the people approve the liberal reforms which have been effected in the Constitution since 1860 by the Emperor, with the concurrence of the great legislative bodies of the state, and ratify the senatus-consultum of April 20, 1870?" On the eve of the election the government detected or concocted an extensive plot to assassinate Napoleon, and arrested many suspected persons. The result of the plébiscite of the 8th of May was that about 7,000,000 voted yes, and 1,500,000 voted no. Louis Napoleon wrote a "History of Julius Cæsar," (1867,) in which he carries out the "Idées Napoléoniennes," inculcating the doctrine that certain gifted men are appointed by Providence or destiny to rule, and that it is as necessary for the people as for themselves that tbis destiny should be fulfilled.

Without a reasonable pretext or tangible cause, he declared war against Prussia about July 15, 1870, and, having appointed the Empress regent, took the command of his army in person. The Germans crossed the frontier early in August, and assumed the offensive. The French were outnumbered and outgeneralled in a series of great battles at Wörth, Metz, and near Sedan. On the 2d of September, Napoleon, who had displayed great incapacity as a general, surrendered himself, with about 100,000 men as prisoners of war, at Sedan. The déchéance of Napoleon was passed in the corps législatif, and a republic was formed by the citizens of Paris, September 4, 1870. He died at Chiselhurst, January 9, 1873.

Nârădă, nâ'ra-da, written also Nareda, the name of a celebrated Hindoo sage and lawgiver, supposed to have been the son of Brahma and Saraswatî. He was tbe inventor of the Vina, a sort of lute, and is said to have been an intimate friend of Krishna.

Năr'ă-sĭng'hă, [modern Hindoo pron. nŭr'ạ-sing'ha or nŭr'ạ-sing', from the Sanscrit nâră, a "man," and singhă, a "lion,"] (the "Man-Lion,") the name, in the Hindoo mythology, of the fourth Avatar of Vishnu. It is related that Hiranyakasipu,* by his penances and sacrifices in honour of Brahma, had obtained as a boon from that deity that he sbould possess universal monarchy and be wholly exempt from deatb or injury from every god, man, or creature in existence. Having now nothing to fear, his arrogance and impiety became insufferable. He had, however, a son of a wholly different character, and remarkable for his piety and virtue. The son, reproving his father's wickedness, once said to him that the Deity was present everywhere. "Is he in that pillar?" said the angry tyrant. "Yes," replied the son. Thereupon Hiranyakasipu, in contempt, struck the pillar with his sword, when the stony mass fell asunder, and a being, half man and half lion, issuing from its centre, tore to pieces the impious wretch who had thus insulted and defied the Divine Power.

See MOOR, "Hindu Pantheon."

Nârâyănă, nâ-râ'ya-na, a Sanscrit word of somewhat uncertain etymology, commonly supposed to signify "moving upon the waters," and applied, in the Hindoo mythology, to the universal Divine Spirit, which existed before all worlds. (Compare Genesis i. 2.) In this sense, Nârâyana may be regarded as another name for BRAHM, (which see;) but it is also frequently used as one of tbe many appellations of Vishnu.

See MOOR, "Hindu Pantheon."

Nârâyănî, nâ-râ'ya-nee', the consort (or saktî) of Nârâyana, considered as Vishnu, and hence a name of LAKSHMÎ, (which see.)

Narbonne, de, dęh năR'bon', (LOUIS,) COUNT, a French courtier and minister of state, was born of the noble family of Narbonne-Lara at Colorno, in Parma, in 1755. He was taken to Paris in 1760, and educated at court, where his mother was a lady of honour. He was handsome, accomplished, and witty, and a favourite of the royal family. In the Revolution he acted with the constitutional party, and became a confidential friend of Madame de Staël, who regarded him with admiration. "She exalted him in her imagination," says Lamartine, "until she raised bim to the height of her ideal." By her influence, partly, he became minister of war in December, 1791. He tried with success the policy of frankness and confidence towards the Assembly, and extorted applause even from the stern and suspicious radicals. He performed prodigies of activity in raising armies and preparing for war. Inspired by his fervent, rapid, and martial eloquence, a glow of patriotism pervaded France. He was suddenly dismissed from office in March, 1792, in consequence of a difference with his colleague and rival De Lessart. About the 10th of August he was proscribed by the Assembly, but, by the efforts of Madame de Staël, escaped to England. He returned to France in 1800, and was restored to his rank as lieutenant-general in 1809. Soon after that he was made ambassador to Bavaria. He attended Bonaparte as aide-de-camp in the Russian campaign, (1812.) Died in 1813.

He sailed on the Alert in 1878 for a two years' survey of the South Pacific, retired in 1886, and was made a vice-admiral in 1892. He published various works on maritime subjects.

Nares, (JAMES,) an English composer, born in Middlesex in 1715. His principal compositions are anthems and other church music; he also published "Lessons for the Harpsichord," and various treatises on music. In 1756 he succeeded Green as organist and composer to the king. He was the preceptor of the composer Arnold. Died in 1783.

Nares, (ROBERT,) a distinguished critic and theologian, a son of the preceding, was born in 1753. He became Archdeacon of Stafford, and pastor of Allhallows Church, London; he also held the office of assistant librarian of the British Museum. He published, among other works, "Elements of Orthoepy," (1784,) and a "Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church," (1805.) He was one of the founders of the "British Critic." Died in 1829.

Nash, (RICHARD,) usually called BEAU NASH, was born at Swansea, Wales, in 1674. He entered the Middle Temple as a student of law, but had an invincible aversion to study and business. He distinguished himself as a man of fashion, a master of the science of gentility, and a paragon of effrontery. His skill as a gambler yielded him an ample revenue. In 1704 he found Bath a vulgar and mismanaged watering-place, infested with ill-bred people. He got himself appointed master of ceremonies, and, by enforcing the rules of good breeding at balls, public assemblies, etc., converted Bath into a fashionable and elegant place of resort. His person was coarse and ungainly, but his vivacity and benevolent or prodigal habits rendered him popular. He is said to have taken measures to guard the unwary youth from falling victims to the designs of villains. During a part of his long period of prosperity and supremacy at Bath, he rode in a six-horse coach with a retinue of servants. In his old age he was impoverished by the act of Parliament which suppressed gaming. Died in 1761.

Y., with which he was connected until his death. He published tables for laboratory use, and edited translations of various handbooks of Wöhler and Elderhorst. Died Jan. 18, 1895.

Nassare, nâs-sâ'rà, (BLAS ANTONIO.) a Spanish miscellaneous writer, born at Alguezar in 1689; died in 1751.

Nassau, nas'saw, [Ger. pron. nâs'sŏw,] HOUSE OF, a noble family, of German origin, which produced many great men, and derived its title from Nassau, on the Rhine. In the sixteenth century the family acquired the principality of Orange, in the southeast of France, after which the Counts of Nassau took the title of Prince of Orange. (See ORANGE, and WILLIAM III. of England.)

Nassau, (HENRY,) COUNT OF, a Flemish nobleman, inherited from his father large estates in Brabant, Flanders, and Holland. In 1515 he married the sister of Philibert, Prince of Orange, by whom he had a son René. Henry was a confidential friend of Charles V., whose governor he had been in that emperor's boyhood. "It was he," says Motley, "whose influence placed the imperial crown upon the head of Charles." He was the uncle of William of Orange, the founder of the Dutch republic.

Nassau, (MAURICE OF,) [Dutch, MAURITS VAN NASSAU, mŏw'rits văn nâs'sŏw; Ger. MORITZ VON NASSAU, mo'rits fon nâs'sŏw,] one of the greatest captains of modern times, was born at the castle of Dillenburg in November, 1567, and was the second son of William the Silent, Prince of Orange, who founded the Dutch republic. About the age of twenty he was elected Governor and Captain-General of the Seven United Provinces, which were then at war with Spain. In 1591 he took Deventer, Zutphen, and other fortified towns. He defeated the Spaniards in a great pitched battle at Turnhout in 1597, and gained a decisive victory over the Archduke Albert of Austria at Nieuwport in 1600. In the ensuing campaigns his skill as a tactician was exerted with uninterrupted success until 1609, when Spain recognized the independence of the Dutch, and a truce of twelve years was signed by the two powers. The patriot Barneveldt, by promoting this peace and opposing the ambitious projects of Maurice, incurred his enmity, and finally became a victim of his cruelty. (See BARNEVELDT.) Maurice received the title of Prince of Orange at the death of his elder brother, about 1618. In 1621 he renewed the war against the Spaniards, who opposed to him the celebrated general Spinola. "His great capacity in the military art," says Hume, "would have compensated the inferiority of his forces, had not the Spanish armies been commanded by Spinola." Maurice compelled his rival to raise the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom in 1622, but Spinola took Breda in 1625. He died in 1625, and was succeeded in the office of Stadtholder by his brother, Frederick Henry, who was the grandfather of William III. of England. Maurice made important improvements in the military art, and excelled especially in the reduction and defence of fortified places.

Ne-an'dẹr, [Ger. pron. nȧ-ăn'dẹr,] (JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM,) an eminent German theologian and ecclesiastical historian, of Jewish extraction, was born at Göttingen in 1789. He became in 1812 professor of theology at Berlin, where he devoted himself zealously to the duties of his office and the advancement of Christianity by his numerous writings. Of these the most important is his "Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church," (in 5 vols., 1843.) Among his other productions we may name "The Emperor Julian and his Times," (1812,) "Memorable Occurrences from the History of Christianity and Christian Life," (3 vols., 1822,) "History of the Planting of the Apostolic Church," (1832,) and "The Life of Jesus Christ in its Historical Relations," (1837,) an able refutation of the well-known work of Strauss. Neander was a member of the Consistory of the province of Brandenburg. His writings have obtained great reputation and influence in foreign countries, as well as in Germany. Died in Berlin in July, 1850.

"Neander still remains beyond doubt the greatest church historian, thus far, of the nineteenth century.

Great, too, especially in this, that he never suffered his renown to obscure at all his sense of the sinfulness and weakness of every human work in this world. With all his comprehensive knowledge, he justly regarded himself as, among many others, merely a forerunner of a new, creative epoch of ever-young Christianity. . . . We stand,' he said, 'on the line between the old world and a new, about to be called into being by the ever-fresh energy of the gospel. For a fourth time an epoch in the life of our race is in preparation by means of Christianity.'" (Dr. Schaff's "History of the Apostolic Church.")

Ne-ar'chus, [Gr. Νέαρχος; Fr. NÉARQUE, nā'ärk',] a celebrated admiral of Alexander the Great, was a native of Crete, or, as some assert, of Amphipolis. About 327 B.C. he set sail from the Indus for the Persian Gulf, and discovered on his passage the mouths of the Euphrates and the Tigris. A detailed account of this voyage is given by Arrian, the accuracy of which has been confirmed by Vincent and other modern geographers. Nearchus, on his return, was received with distinguished favour by Alexander, who assured him that he rejoiced more in the success of the expedition than in having conquered Asia. He also received from his sovereign a golden crown. After the death of Alexander, Nearchus was made governor of Pamphylia and Lycia.

Nebi, nĕb'ee, an admired Turkish poet of the seventeenth century, flourished under the reign of Mahomet IV.

Ne'bo, called in Assyrian NABIU or NABU, "the prophet," a great divinity of ancient Babylon. He was possibly the same as the Persian Mithra. He was by the Accad people called "the Creator," and among the Assyrians was the god of knowledge and books. He was called "the overseer of the hosts of Heaven and Earth."

Neb-ris-sen'sis, (ANTONIUS,) an eminent Spanish scholar, whose proper name was ANTONIO DE LEBRIXA, (dā lā-bree'hā,) was born at Lebrixa in 1444. He studied the classics in Italy, and, returning to Spain in 1473, became to that country what Erasmus was to Germany or Budé (Budæus) to France. As professor in the University of Salamanca, he initiated a reform in the method of teaching Latin and Greek. He published a Latin Lexicon, (1492,) a "Lexicon of Civil Law," (1506,) which is highly commended, and grammars of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. About 1514 he became professor of rhetoric at Alcalá. "The men to whom Spain chiefly owes the advancement of useful learning," says Hallam, "were Arias Barbosa and the more renowned Antonio de Lebrixa." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1522.

He took Jerusalem in 606 B.C., and carried to Babylon many captives, among whom was the prophet Daniel. King Zedekiah having revolted, Nebuchadnezzar took his capital in 588, destroyed the great temple by fire, threw down the walls of the city, and transported the Jewish people to Babylon. He afterwards captured Tyre, conquered Egypt, and became probably the most powerful monarch of that age in the world. Having become too much elated by pride and prosperity, he was, by divine visitation, deprived of his reason and deposed from his throne. Restored to reason and power a short time before his death, he published a pious proclamation of his experience and of his recognition of the King of heaven.

Necker, nek'kẹr or nā'kair', (ALBERTINE ADRIENNE de Saussure—dẹh sō'sür',) a Swiss authoress, born at Geneva in 1766, was a daughter of the naturalist, H. B. de Saussure. She was married to J. Necker, a nephew of the great financier, and a cousin of Madame de Staël, of whom she was an intimate friend. She wrote a "Notice of the Character of Madame de Staël," (1820,) and "Progressive Education," (2 vols., 1828–32.) Died in 1841.

See SENEBIER, "Histoire littéraire de Genève."

Necker, nek'kẹr, [Fr. pron. nā'kair',] (JACQUES,) an eminent Swiss financier, and prime minister of France, born at Geneva in September, 1732. On leaving college he became a clerk in a banking-house in Paris, and, having acquired a large fortune as partner of the great banker Thélusson, he retired from business in the prime of life, and aspired to public honours and more brilliant financial achievements. In 1773 he gained the prize offered by the French Academy for a eulogy on Colbert, and published a treatise on the corn-laws, "Sur la Législation des Grains." The disorder of the finances was so alarming that, without regard to official routine, he was appointed director of the treasury in 1776, and director-general of the finances in 1777. By publicity, order, and economy, he restored the public credit and lightened the burdens of the people. His famous compte rendu of 1781 (which was the first public exposition of the revenue and expenses of the State) was received with great favour; but his reforms made for him many enemies at court and elsewhere. To defend himself against their intrigues, he asked for a seat in the council, which was refused because he was a Protestant. He immediately resigned, (1781,) and retired to Coppet, on Lake Leman.

In 1784 he published his excellent work "On the Administration of the Finances," of which eighty thousand copies were sold in a few days. The convocation of the States-General was decreed by the royal council in August, 1788. The court was convinced that the skill of Necker was indispensable in the political and financial crisis that followed. He succeeded Brienne as prime minister, or contrôleur-général of finances, about September 1, 1788, and the next day the funds rose 30 per cent. He favoured the Revolution by granting to the Tiers-État a double number of deputies. He is censured for this concession, and for temporizing in the contest between the Tiers-État and the other orders after the meeting of the States-General in 1789. The court having adopted more violent measures than he approved, he tendered his resignation, (June 23,) which was not accepted. On the 11th of July he was suddenly dismissed by a note from the king, who ordered him to leave the kingdom privately; and the same night he departed for Brussels. Indignant at his dismissal, the populace of Paris rose in arms, stormed the Bastille, and obtained a bloody triumph over the court. Necker was recalled on the 21st of July, and, when he entered Paris, was received with enthusiastic demonstrations by the people. His first act was an amnesty for political offences. But he was too conservative to satisfy the popular party, and resigned his office in September, 1790. He passed the rest of his life at Coppet, where he wrote several political and religious treatises. Died in 1804. The highly-gifted Madame de Staël was his daughter.

Nel'sŏn, (DAVID,) an American Presbyterian divine and eloquent preacher, born near Jonesborough, Tennessee, in 1793. He became pastor of a church at Danville, Kentucky, in 1828, and subsequently assisted in founding a college in Marion county, Missouri, of which he was appointed president. His work entitled "The Cause and Cure of Infidelity" enjoys a high reputation, and has passed through numerous editions. Dr. Nelson was an earnest advocate for the abolition of slavery. Died in 1844.

Nel'sŏn, (HORATIO,) LORD, a British naval hero and admiral of the first order, born at Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk, on the 29th of September, 1758, was the son of Rev. Edmund Nelson and Catherine Suckling. He was endowed with great intrepidity and energy, and possessed a generous, impetuous temper. He went to sea about the age of thirteen, served a number of years in the East Indies, and took part in several actions of the American war. In 1779 he became a post-captain, and in 1787 married the widow of Dr. Nisbet, of the island of Nevis. He obtained command of a ship in the Mediterranean fleet in 1793, contributed to the victory over the Spaniards at Saint Vincent in 1797, and was raised to the rank of rear-admiral in the same year. His next enterprise was an attack on Teneriffe, where he was repulsed, with the loss of his right arm.

In 1798 he attempted to intercept the passage of the French armament to Egypt, but missed it, until he overtook it in Aboukir Bay, where in August he gained the decisive battle of the Nile. For this service he was rewarded with the title of Baron Nelson of the Nile, and a pension of £3000. While he was employed on the coast of Naples, (1799,) he became fascinated by the pernicious influence of Lady Hamilton, and tarnished his fame by executing Prince Carraccioli and other republicans, who were sacrificed to the vengeance of the court of Naples. Soon after these events he separated from his wife, who was supplanted in his affections by Lady Hamilton. He was second in command under Sir Hyde Parker of the armament sent against Copenhagen in 1801; but the honour of the victory at the battle of the Baltic is ascribed to Nelson. In the midst of the battle, Parker having made a signal to retreat, Nelson put a spy-glass to his blind eye and exclaimed, "I really don't see the signal." "He had won the day," says Southey, "by disobeying orders." For this success he was raised to the rank of viscount.

War against France having been renewed in 1803, he took the command of the Mediterranean fleet, hoisted his flag on the Victory, and watched the French fleet off Toulon for more than a year. In May, 1805, he sailed for the West Indies in pursuit of Admiral Villeneuve, but was disappointed, and the hostile fleet returned safely to Europe, followed by the English admiral. He then went home and proposed to suspend his active service, but was re-appointed in September, 1805, in accordance with the general wishes of the nation, by whom he was more idolized than almost any other man had been. On the 21st of October, (1805,) with twenty-seven sail of the line and four frigates, he attacked the combined French and Spanish fleets, of forty ships, under Villeneuve, near Cape Trafalgar. Before the fight began, he gave the famous signal, "England expects every man to do his duty." The English gained a complete victory, but Nelson was mortally wounded by a musket-ball fired from the Redoutable, which was in close proximity to the flag-ship, the Victory. He is eulogized by Southey as "the greatest naval hero of our own and of all former times."

Nemours, de, (JACQUES DE SAVOY,) DUC, a distinguished French general, born in Champagne in 1531, was the son of Philip, Duc de Génevois and de Nemours, whose sister Louise was the mother of King Francis I. He fought against the Protestants in the civil war, and distinguished himself at the battle of Saint-Denis, in 1567. He opposed the ambitious designs of the Guise family, and took no part in the civil war between the League and the king. Died in 1585.

See BRANTÔME, "Vies des grands Capitaines."

Nemours, de, (LOUIS D'ARMAGNAC,) DUC, a French military commander, born about 1472, was a son of Jacques, noticed above. He served in Italy against the Spaniards, and was made Viceroy of Naples by Louis XII. He was killed in the battle of Cerignola, while opposing Gonsalvo de Córdova, (1503.) He was the last of the family of Armagnac, and the duchy of Nemours was given to Gaston de Foix in 1505.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français;" SAINT-GELAIS, "Histoire de Louis XII."

Nemours, de, (LOUIS CHARLES PHILIPPE RAPHAEL d'Orléans—dor'là'ôN',) DUC, a French prince, a son of King Louis Philippe, was born in 1814. He was chosen King of Belgium by a congress of that nation in 1831, but was compelled by his father to decline the offer. He served in the army in Algeria, and obtained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1837. After the death of his elder brother (1842) he was recognized as future regent in case the king should die during the minority of his heir, the Count of Paris. On the abdication of Louis Philippe (1848) he waived his claim to the regency in favour of the Duchess of Orléans, whom he attended when she presented herself, with her son, before the Chamber of Deputies. Died June 25, 1896.

Ne'pos, (CORNELIUS,) a celebrated Roman historian of the time of Julius Cæsar. He was an intimate friend of Cicero and Atticus, and dedicated to the latter his "Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum," ("Lives of the Illustrious Generals.") This work, which is his only one extant, is distinguished for the purity and graceful simplicity of its style, and has been generally adopted as a class-book in schools and colleges.

See J. C. F. BAEHR, "Geschichte der Römischen Literatur:" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Nepos, (FLAVIUS JULIUS,) was created Emperor of the West, A.D. 473, by Leo X., the Emperor of the East. He concluded a peace with Euric, King of the Visigoths, to whom he ceded a portion of Gaul. In 475 Orestes, a native of Pannonia, marched against Nepos, defeated him, and proclaimed his own son Romulus Emperor of the West. In 480 Nepos was assassinated at Salona.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Nep'tune, [Lat. NEPTU'NUS,] the god of the sea, a Roman divinity, identified with the Posei'don of the Greek mythology. He was said to be a son of Saturn and Rhea, the brother of Jupiter, and the father of Triton. His wife was Amphitrite. He was regarded as equal in dignity to Jupiter, but inferior in power. The poets feigned that he once conspired with Apollo and Juno against Jupiter, that he built the walls of Troy for Laomedon, and that he resented the perfidy of that king by fighting against the Trojans at the siege of Troy. Neptune and Minerva disputed for the possession of Attica, or for the honour of naming its capital, and the gods decided that the preference should be given to the one who should bestow on man the most valuable gift. Neptune, with a stroke of his trident, produced the war-horse, and Minerva created the olive, which was judged to be the more useful of the two. He is also fabled to have disputed with Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva for the sovereignty of several other countries. The symbol of his power was the trident, with which he shook the solid land and controlled the stormy sea. The poets describe him as riding in a chariot drawn by horses on the surface of the sea, the waves of which subside at his approach, and attended by a retinue of marine monsters which play around him. Besides his residence on Olympus, he had a fine palace in the depth of the sea near Ægæ.

Neptunus. See NEPTUNE.

Nera'tius (ne-rā'shę-us) Pris'cus, a Roman jurist under the reigns of Trajan and Adrian, whose favour and patronage he enjoyed. He was the author of numerous books on the Roman law, which have been often quoted by later jurists.

Nérée, nà'rà', (R. J.,) a French poet, lived in the time of Henry IV., and wrote a drama entitled "The Triumph of the League," (1607.)

Ne're-ids, [Gr. Νηρηΐδες, sing. Νηρεΐς; Lat. NERE'IDES; Fr. NÉRÉIDES, nà'rà'ĕd',] the daughters of Nereus, were sea-nymphs or mermaids of Greek mythology. The number of the Nereids was fifty. Among them were Amphitrite and Thetis, the mother of Achilles. The Nereids were represented originally as beautiful maidens, and sometimes as half woman and half fish.

Ne're-is or Ne-re'I-ne, a name given to each of the NEREIDS, which see.

Ne'reŭs, [Gr. Νηρεύς; Fr. NÉRÉE, nà'rà',] a marine divinity of classic mythology, called a son of Pontus and the Earth, and the father of the Nereids. He was represented as a wise and prophetic old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he lived. The poets feigned that he could assume various forms, like Proteus, and would only reveal the future when, having exhausted his powers of transformation, he was reduced to his original shape. Hercules is said to have seized him and extorted from him some secret respecting the golden apples of the Hesperides.

Neri. See NEGRI, (PIETRO MARTINE.)

Neri, nā'ree, (ANTONIO,) an Italian chemist, born at Florence, lived about 1570–90. He wrote a work "On the Art of making Glass," (1592,) often reprinted.

Neri, [Lat. NE'RIUS,] (FILIPPO,) called SAINT PHILIP NERI, an Italian ecclesiastic, born at Florence in 1515. He founded about 1548 the Congregation of the Priests of the Oratory, the members of which, without taking a monastic vow, were required to live in the exercise of devotion and charity and apply themselves to theological studies. He was the first to introduce the musical entertainments called oratorios, from their being performed in a chapel or oratorio. He died in 1595, and Baronius, afterwards cardinal, succeeded him as general of the order. Neri was canonized by Gregory XV. in 1622.

Nerli, nĕR'lee, (FILIPPO,) an Italian historian, born at Florence in 1485, was a senator and an adherent of the Medici. He wrote a "History of Florence from 1215 to 1537," which was first published in 1728. Died in 1556.

See a "Life of Nerli" prefixed to his History.

Ne'ro, (CAIUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman soldier, who in 214 B.C. commanded a force of cavalry in the war against Hannibal. In 212 B.C. he commanded in Spain against Hasdrubal. In 207 he was one of the consuls, and defeated Hannibal, after which he joined his forces with those of Marcus Livius, his colleague, and on the river Metaurus totally defeated the Carthaginian army under Hasdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, who was slain in the battle. This was one of the most important battles in universal history. It virtually ended the second Punic war, and saved Rome. Nero cut off the head of Hasdrubal and threw it into Hannibal's camp. Livius had the honour of a triumph for this victory, but historians generally have given to Nero the principal credit.

Ne'ro, [Fr. NÉRON, nà'rôN'; It. NERONE, nà-ro'nà,] (LUCIUS DOMITIUS,) the sixth of the Roman emperors, born in 37 A.D., was the son of Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. His mother, after becoming a widow, having married her uncle the emperor Claudius, the latter adopted Nero and gave to him his daughter Octavia in marriage, adding to his name that of Claudius Drusus. On the death of Claudius, who was poisoned by Agrippina, A.D. 54, Nero was proclaimed emperor, to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. The counsels of Seneca and Burrus, who were placed at the head of government, had for a time a salutary effect upon Nero, and the first years of his rule were marked by kindness and justice; but his evil passions eventually prevailed, and the remainder of his reign was signalized by a series of atrocities. Becoming jealous of Britannicus, he caused him to be poisoned, and, having soon after formed an attachment to Poppæa, murdered his mother at her instigation and made her his wife. He next caused Octavia, whom he had divorced, to be put to death. In A.D. 64 Rome was nearly destroyed by a fire which Nero was accused of having kindled. It was said that he amused himself, while viewing the conflagration, with reciting verses descriptive of the fall of Troy. In order to remove suspicion from himself, he charged the crime upon the Christians, many of whom were in consequence subjected to the most cruel tortures. A conspiracy formed against the tyrant, A.D. 65, was discovered, and many distinguished citizens were executed, among whom were Lucan and Seneca. Soon after this, Vindex and Galba revolted against the emperor, who, on hearing of their defection and that of the prætorian guards, destroyed himself, with the assistance of a servant, A.D. 68.

Nes-to'rĭ-us, the founder of the sect of Nestorians, was born at Germanicia, in Syria, near the end of the fourth century. Having become a popular preacher, he was elected Patriarch of Constantinople in 428 A.D. He occasioned a schism by objecting to call the Virgin Mary the mother of God. The dispute was fomented by Cyril of Alexandria, who became a violent adversary of Nestorius. A council was called at Ephesus by the emperor Theodosius in 431; and, before the arrival of John of Antioch and several other bishops, Nestorius was deposed, on a charge of blasphemy. He was afterwards banished to an oasis in Egypt. The Nestorians became numerous in the East, and still exist as a distinct sect in Koordistan and Mesopotamia.

Newcastle, (THOMAS PELHAM,) DUKE OF, an English Whig minister of state, born in 1693, was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Pelham, of Sussex. His mother was a sister of John Hollis, Duke of Newcastle, who, dying in 1711, left a princely fortune to the subject of this article. In 1715 he was created Duke of Newcastle, and in 1724 appointed secretary of state. In 1754 he was promoted to the office of first lord of the treasury, (or premier,) which was then vacated by the death of his brother, Henry Pelham. He resigned reluctantly in November, 1756, and, after a ministerial crisis, formed a coalition with Pitt, and was again prime minister, or co-ordinate chief minister, from 1757 until May, 1762, when Lord Bute became premier. "His love of influence," says Macaulay, (in his Review of Walpole's "Letters to Horace Mann,") "was so intense a passion tbat it supplied the place of talents, that it inspired even fatuity with cunning. . . . All the able men of his time ridiculed him as a dunce, a driveller, a child who never knew his own mind for an hour togetber; and he overreached them all round." He died, without issue, in 1768, when the title passed to Henry Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, who had married a daughter and heiress of Henry Pelham.

His principal writings are "Financial Policy," (1865,) "A.B.C. of Finance," (1877,) "Popular Astronomy," (1878,) a "Course of Mathematics," (1881,) "Principles of Political Economy," (1886,) etc.

Newcomb, nū'kŭm, (THOMAS,) an English poet, born in 1675, became rector of Stopham, in Sussex, about 1734. He wrote, besides other poems, "The Library," (1718,) and "The Last Judgment," (1723.) Died about 1766.

Newcome, (WILLIAM,) a learned prelate and eminent biblical scholar, born in Bedfordshire in 1729. He became successively Bishop of Ossory and of Waterford, in Ireland, and in 1795 Archbishop of Armagh. He was the author of a "Historical View of the English Biblical Translations," and "Harmony of tbe Gospels," (1778.) Died in 1800.

See the "Monthly Review" for October, 1779.

New-com'ẹn, (MATTHEW,) an English nonconformist, was a member of the Westminster Assembly of divines. He was one of the five persons who wrote "Smectymnus," a controversial work against Bishop Hall. Died at Leyden in 1666.

Newcommen or Newcomen, nu-kom'ẹn, (THOMAS,) an English locksmith, born in Devonshire, was one of the inventors of the steam-engine. In 1705 Newcommen and Cawley (a glazier of that place) obtained a patent for an engine combining for the first time the cylinder and piston, with a separate boiler. The steam admitted below the piston was condensed by the application of cold water, and the pressure of the atmosphere, forcing down the piston, moved a working-beam, to one end of which a pump-rod was attached. This engine was much used in mines.

See J. ROBISON, "System of Mechanical Philosophy."

New'dĭ-gate, (Sir Roger,) an English gentleman of fine taste and classical attainments, born in Warwickshire in 1719. He was for many years representative in Parliament for the University of Oxford. He was a generous patron of that institution, to which he gave the Florentine Museum, Piranesi's works, and the candelabra in the Radcliffe Library. Died in 1780.

New'ell, (Robert Henry,) an American humourist, born at New York in 1836. He became a journalist and editor in New York, and was widely known for his "Orpheus C. Kerr" papers, (four volumes of humourous letters on the civil war.) He also published several volumes of poems, novels, etc.

New'man, (Francis W.,) an English author, brother of John Henry, noticed below, was born in London in 1805. He was educated at Oxford, and, after he left college, passed three years in the Turkish empire, (1830–33.) In 1840 he became professor of languages at Manchester New College. He was appointed professor of Latin in University College, London, in 1846. Among his principal works are a "History of the Hebrew Monarchy," (1847,) "The Soul: its Sorrows and Aspirations," (1849,) "Phases of Faith, or Passages from the History of my Creed," (1850,) "Lectures on Ancient and Modern History," (1851,) "English Institutions and their Reforms," (1865,) "Hand-Book of Modern Arabic," (1866,) etc. His religious views were the opposite of those of his brother, and advocated a form of faith including the best features of all known religions. Died in 1897.

Newman, (Henry R.,) an American artist, born at New York city in 1833. He became noted for water-colour paintings of architecture, landscape, and flowers.

Newman, (John Henry,) an eminent English theologian, born in London in 1801. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1816, and was elected a Fellow of Oriel College in 1822. At Oriel College he formed a friendship with John Keble the poet, and with Dr. Whately. He was ordained a priest in 1824, and became vice-principal of Alban Hall in 1825, and a tutor of Oriel College in 1826. In 1828 he was appointed vicar of Saint Mary's, Oxford, and of Littlemore. In 1833 Newman, Keble, and Pusey initiated the "Oxford movement" in favour of High-Church doctrines, which they advocated in a series of "Tracts for the Times." He manifested a growing tendency to Roman Catholicism in his "Arians of the Fourth Century: their Doctrines, Temper, and Conduct," (1833,) his "Tract No. 90," (1841,) and his "Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine." He became a member of the Roman Catholic Church in 1845, and was the principal of the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri at Birmingham from 1848 to 1852. In the latter year he was fined one hundred pounds for a libel on Dr. Achilli. He defended or explained his religious course in a work entitled "Apology for his Life," ("Apologia pro Vita sua," 1864.) He published a collection of poems, (1868,) "The Grammar of Assent," (1870,) and "A Letter addressed to his Grace the Duke of Norfolk, on the Occasion of Mr. Gladstone's Recent Expostulation," (1875.) He was made a cardinal-deacon in 1879. Died August 11, 1890.

Newman, (John Philip,) an American bishop, born at New York in 1826. He entered the Methodist Episcopal ministry in 1849, and was elected bishop in 1888. He was noted as a pulpit orator and lecturer, and wrote "From Dan to Beersheba," "Thrones and Palaces of Babylon and Nineveh," "America for Americans," "The Supremacy of Law," etc. Died in 1899.

New'march, (William,) an English political economist, born in 1820. His most important work was the preparation of the two concluding volumes of "Tooke and Newmarch's History of Prices," (1856.) Died March 23, 1882.

Newport, (George,) F.R.S., an English comparative anatomist and entomologist, born at Canterbury in 1803. He practised medicine, and devoted much time to the study of the anatomy of insects, on which subjects he contributed to the "Philosophical Transactions" a number of memoirs. One of these was "On the Nervous System of the Sphinx." He was elected president of the Entomological Society in 1844. Died in 1854.

New'ton, (Alfred,) a British zoologist, born at Genoa in 1829. He was educated at Cambridge, and became professor of zoology there in 1866. Among his works are "The Zoology of Ancient Europe," (1862,) "Ootheca Wolleyana," (1864,) the "Dictionary of Birds," (1896,) etc.

New'ton, (Charles Thomas,) a British archæologist, born in 1816. He graduated in 1837 at Christ Church, Oxford, and was employed (1840–52) in the British Museum. Becoming vice-consul at Mitylene, he made important explorations in Asia Minor. In 1880 he was appointed professor of archæology in the University of Oxford. Among his writings are a "History of Discoveries at Halicarnassus," etc., (2 vols., 1862,) "Travels in the Levant," (1865,) "Essays on Art and Archæology," (1880,) etc. Died November 28, 1894.

New'ton, (Gilbert Stuart,) a distinguished painter, of English extraction, born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1794. He painted numerous small pictures of great merit, among which we may name "Shylock and Jessica" and "Portia and Bassanio." Died in 1835.

Newton, (Hubert Anson,) LL.D., an American mathematician, born at Sherburne, New York, March 19, 1830. He graduated at Yale College in 1850, and became professor there in 1855. Died Aug. 12, 1896.

Newton, (Sir Isaac,) an illustrious English philosopher and mathematician, born at Woolsthorpe, in Lincolnshire, on the 25th of December, 1642, (Old Style.) He was the posthumous and only child of Isaac Newton, a farmer, who died in 1642. His mother, whose original name was Hannah Ayscough, was married again to the Rev. Barnabas Smith in 1645. He attended the schools of Skillington and Stoke for several years, and about the age of twelve entered the grammar-school of Grantham. There he manifested much mechanical ingenuity by the construction of a windmill, a water-clock, a sundial, and other pieces of mechanism. He also wrote verses in his boyhood. He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a sub-sizar, in June, 1661, before which date it does not appear that he had been a profound student of mathematics. It has been stated that he commenced the study of Euclid's "Elements," but he found the first propositions so self-evident that he threw the book aside as too trifling. "When Newton entered Trinity College," says Brewster, "he brought with him a more slender portion of science than at his age falls to the lot of ordinary scholars." Among the works which he first studied at Cambridge were the "Optics" of Kepler and the "Geometry" of Descartes. In 1664 he read Wallis's "Arithmetica Infinitorum," and discovered the method of infinite series, or the binomial theorem, which enabled him to compute the area of curves and to solve with ease problems which before were insoluble or very difficult. He took the degree of B.A. in 1665, and discovered the differential calculus, or method of fluxions, probably in the same year. This important method of mathematical investigation was discovered by Leibnitz about the same time, and before Newton had published anything on the subject. A controversy arose between the English and foreign mathematicians about the priority of the discovery. Sir David Brewster gives this decision of the question: 1. That Newton was the first inventor of the method of fluxions; that the method was incomplete in its notation, and that the fundamental principle of it was not published to the world till 1687. 2. That Leibnitz communicated his differential calculus to Newton in 1677, with a complete system of notation, and that he published it in 1684.

As a precaution against the plague, he retired from Cambridge to his native place in the summer of 1665. He then and there began to speculate on the subject of gravity. It was in the autumn of 1665 that the apple which suggested to him the idea of gravitation is said to have fallen from the tree at Woolsthorpe. "When sitting alone in the garden," says Brewster, "and speculating on the power of gravity, it occurred to him that as the same power by which the apple fell to the ground was not sensibly diminished at the greatest distance from the centre of the earth to which we can reach, . . . it might extend to the moon and retain her in her orbit in the same manner as it bends into a curve a stone or cannon-ball when projected in a straight line from the surface of the earth." He arrived at the conclusion that the force of gravity by which the planets were retained in their orbits varied as the squares of their distances from the sun; but, not being prepared to verify this hypothesis, he abandoned or deferred the subject for many years.

He returned to Cambridge in 1666, and applied himself to the grinding of optic glasses, and began to study the subject of colours in connection with the prismatic spectrum. He was elected a Minor Fellow in October, 1667, and took his degree of M.A. in March, 1668, as twenty-third on the list of one hundred and forty-eight graduates. He made a small reflecting telescope in 1668, and succeeded Dr. Barrow, as Lucasian professor of mathematics, in 1669. About this date he made the grand discovery that light is not homogeneous, but consists of rays of different refrangibility. He also perceived that this different refrangibility was the real cause of the imperfection of refracting telescopes. In 1671 he constructed with his own hands a second reflecting telescope, which is preserved in the library of the Royal Society. Newton read a course of lectures on optics, at Cambridge, in 1669, 1670, and 1671. He was the author of the theory of light called the Emission theory, according to which light is composed of, or produced by, material particles of inconceivable minuteness, emitted by luminous bodies in all directions. On this subject he was involved in a controversy with Hooke and Huygens, who maintained the undulatory theory. In a letter to Leibnitz, dated December 9, 1675, he writes, "I was so persecuted with discussions arising out of my theory of light, that I blamed my own imprudence for parting with so substantial a blessing as my quiet to run after a shadow." He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in January, 1672. In December, 1675, he communicated to that body a discourse entitled a "Theory of Light and Colours." "The theory of Newton," says Sir John Herschel, "gives a complete and elegant explanation of what may be considered the chief of all optical facts,—the production of colours in the ordinary refraction of light by a prism, the discovery of which by him marks one of the greatest epochs in the annals of experimental science." ("Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.") His optical discoveries are described in a work entitled "Opticks, or a Treatise on the Reflexions, Refractions, Inflexions, and Colours of Light," which was published in 1704, but written many years earlier. "To avoid being engaged in disputes about these matters," says the author, "I have hitherto delayed the printing." The only other optical work by Newton was his "Lectiones Opticæ," (1728,) which contains the lectures he read at Cambridge in 1669–71.

Newton had abandoned the subject of gravity in 1665, after an attempt to verify his theory by a calculation which failed because he had employed an erroneous measure of the earth's radius. About 1684 he resumed his inquiries and calculations in relation to the moon, and employed Picard's more accurate measure of the earth's diameter. He thus demonstrated the great truth that the orbit of the moon is curved by the same force which causes bodies to fall on the surface of the earth. According to a doubtful tradition, he became so much agitated as his calculations drew to a close, that he was obliged to ask a friend to finish them. "This anecdote is not supported by what is known of Newton's character." (Brewster's "Life of Newton.") He announced this discovery to the Royal Society in 1685 by his treatise "De Motu." This was the germ of his greatest work, the "Principia," (composed in 1685–86,) which Laplace regarded as "pre-eminent above all other productions of the human intellect." The full title of this work, which was published by the Royal Society or by Halley in 1687, is "The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy," ("Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica.") It consists of three Books, of which the first and second are entitled "On the Motion of Bodies," and the third "On the System of the World." "The great discovery," says Brewster, "which characterizes the 'Principia' is that of the principle of universal gravitation, that every particle of matter in the universe is attracted by, or gravitates to, every other particle of matter, with a force inversely proportional to the squares of their distances."

"The glory of these men," says Macaulay, referring to Wallis and Halley, "is cast into the shade by the transcendent lustre of one immortal name. In Isaac Newton two kinds of intellectual power, which have little in common, and which are not often found together in a very high degree of vigour, but which nevertheless are equally necessary in the most sublime departments of natural philosophy, were united as they have never been united before or since. . . . In no other mind have the demonstrative faculty and the inductive faculty coexisted in such supreme excellence and perfect harmony." ("History of England," vol. i. chap. iii.)

In 1687 James II. sent an illegal mandamus to the University of Cambridge, directing that a certain monk should be admitted a master of arts without taking the oath of allegiance. Newton took an active and influential part in defending the privileges of the university on this occasion. He represented Cambridge in the Convention Parliament, January, 1689–February, 1690, and maintained the principles of civil and religious liberty in that critical period of revolution. In 1689 he became acquainted with John Locke, with whom he associated on friendly terms and corresponded until his death. Newton, though satiated with fame, had gained no pecuniary benefit by his writings, and had received no mark of national gratitude for his discoveries. Locke and Charles Montague endeavoured to procure for him some permanent appointment, but without success.

In 1692 and 1693 he wrote to Bentley four celebrated letters on the formation of the sun and the planets, etc., in which he affirms that the motions of the planets could not be produced by any natural cause alone, but were impressed by an intelligent agent and Divine power. A report was circulated, chiefly on the continent, that Newton was insane, about 1692. The story that his precious manuscripts were burned through the agency of his little dog Diamond, seems to be equally unfounded. "He never had any communion with dogs or cats." (Brewster.)

In 1694 Newton was occupied by researches on the lunar theory, and obtained from Flamsteed his observations on the moon. Letters were exchanged between them in relation to these observations, which became the occasion of an intemperate and discreditable controversy. Newton was appointed warden of the mint in 1695 or 1696 by his friend Montague, Earl of Halifax, who had resolved on an important scheme of re-coinage of clipped and debased coin. The salary of this office was about £600. In 1699 he was promoted to be master of the mint, with a salary of from £1200 to £1500. In 1703 he was returned to Parliament by the University of Cambridge, and was elected President of the Royal Society. He continued until his death to occupy the latter position, to which he was annually re-elected. He was knighted by Queen Anne in 1705. Among his important works are "The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended," (1728,) and "Observations upon the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of Saint John," (first published in 1733.) "That the greatest philosopher of which any age can boast," says Brewster, "was a sincere and humble believer in the leading doctrines of our religion and lived conformably to its precepts, has been justly regarded as a proud triumph of the Christian faith." Newton's religious opinions, however, were not strictly orthodox: like Milton, he appears to have had a decided leaning towards Arianism.

Newton was never married. His latter years were passed in London, where he lived in a handsome style and kept six servants. He was extremely generous and liberal in the use of money, for which he is said to have had a great contempt. On one occasion he offered Dr. Cheselden, as a fee, a handful of guineas out of his coat-pocket. He was often so absorbed in meditation that he forgot to eat, and it was necessary for his servants to remind him of his meals. He died at Kensington on the 20th of March, 1727, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His collected works were published by Bishop Horsley in 5 vols. 4to, (1779–85.)

Near the end of his life he said, "I know not what I may appear to the world, but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the sea-shore and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me."

"Though there be few," says Dr. Chalmers, "who comprehend or follow Newton in his gigantic walk, yet all may participate in his triumphant feeling when he reached that lofty summit where the whole mystery and magnificence of nature stood submitted to his gaze,—an eminence won by him through the power and patience of intellect alone, but from which he descried a scene more glorious far than imagination could have formed, or than ever had been pictured and set forth in the sublimest visions of poetry." ("Treatise on the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man.")

"Whichever way we turn our view," says Sir John F. W. Herschel, "we find ourselves compelled to bow before his genius, and to assign to the name of Newton a place in our veneration which belongs to no other in the annals of science. His era marks the accomplished maturity of the human reason as applied to such objects. . . . His wonderful combination of mathematical skill with physical research enabled him to invent at pleasure new and unheard-of methods of investigating the effects of those causes which his clear and penetrating mind detected in operation. Ascending by a series of close-compacted inductive arguments to the highest axioms of dynamical science, he succeeded in applying them to the complete explanation of all the great astronomical phenomena." ("Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.")

Newton, (JOHN,) an English mathematician, born in Northamptonshire in 1622, was the author of "Geometrical Trigonometry," "Astronomia Britannica," and other works. Died in 1678.

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Newton, (JOHN,) an English divine, born in London in 1725. Having for many years led a profligate life as a sailor, and engaging in the African slave-trade, he was converted, and distinguished himself thenceforth by his zeal in the cause of religion. In 1764 he became curate of Olney, where he acquired the friendship of Cowper, and wrote, in conjunction with him, the "Olney Hymns." He also published a "Review of Ecclesiastical History," (1770,) "Cardiphonia," etc., and other works. Died in 1807.

New'ton, (JOHN,) an American general, born in Virginia, graduated at West Point in 1842. He became a brigadier-general of Union volunteers in 1861, and commanded a brigade in the battles before Richmond, June, 1862, and a division at Gettysburg, July 1–3, 1863. He served under General Sherman in Georgia in 1864, with distinction, and was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in 1865. After the war he was engaged in removing the obstructions to navigation in Hell Gate. He became brigadier-general and chief of engineers in 1885, retired in 1886, was made commissioner of public works in New York in 1887, and president of the Panama Railroad Company in 1888. Died in 1895.

Newton, (REGINALD HEBER,) D.D., an American clergyman, a son of Rev. Dr. Richard Newton, was born in Philadelphia, October 31, 1840. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. Ordained to the ministry of the Episcopal Church, his extreme "Broad Church" position attracted much attention. Among his works are "The Children's Church," (1872,) "The Morals of Trade," (1876,) "Womanhood," (1880,) "Studies of Jesus," (1881,) "The Right and Wrong Uses of the Bible," (1883,) and "The Book of Beginnings," (1884.) He has written much on social and industrial questions.

Newton, (RICHARD,) an English divine, born about 1675, became canon of Christ Church, Oxford. He published a work entitled "Pluralities Indefensible," (1744.) He was the founder of Hertford College, Oxford. Died in 1753.

See CHALMERS, "History of Oxford."

Newton, (RICHARD,) D.D., an American clergyman, born in Liverpool, England, July 25, 1813. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1834, and at the General Theological Seminary, New York, in 1839, and held Episcopalian pastorships, chiefly in Philadelphia. He published twenty-two volumes, many of them containing sermons for the young, which have had a wide popularity and have been translated into many foreign languages. Died May 25, 1887.

New'ton, (ROBERT,) a Scottish Methodist clergyman born in 1780. He preached in London and Liverpool, and was appointed in 1839 a delegate to the General Conference of the United States. He was a popular preacher. Died in 1854.

Newton, (THOMAS,) an English divine, born at Lichfield in 1704, rose through various preferments to be Bishop of Bristol, (1761.) He published an excellent edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost," with notes, (1749,) and "Dissertations on the Prophecies," etc., (3 vols., 1754–58,) which were translated into German and Danish. Died in 1782.

See "Life of Thomas Newton," prefixed to the second edition of his Works; "Monthly Review" for February and March, 1783.

Newton, (THOMAS,) an English littérateur, born in Essex, became master of Macclesfield School. He was the author of a "History of the Saracens," (1575,) of a number of Latin poems, and other works. Died in 1607.

See WARTON, "History of English Poetry."

Newton, (WILLIAM,) an English architect and writer, published an English translation of Vitruvius, (2 vols., 1771.)

Newton, (WILLIAM WILBERFORCE,) an American clergyman, a brother of R. H. Newton, was born in Philadelphia, November 4, 1843. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1865, and at the Philadelphia Divinity School in 1868, and became a presbyter of the Episcopal Church. Among his works are "Essays of To-Day," (1879,) "The Voice of Saint John," a poem, (1880,) "Priest and Man," a novel, (1883,) "The Legend of Saint Telemachus," a poem, (1882,) and some volumes of sermons for children.

Ney, nā, (FRANÇOIS,) a Flemish diplomatist, born at Antwerp, became general of the order of Saint Francis, in Spain, in 1607. He was the principal agent of the Spanish king in the negotiation of the treaty of peace which recognized the independence of the revolted Dutch provinces in 1609. Watson the historian speaks highly of his talents and address.

See GROTIUS, "Histoire des Troubles des Pays-Bas."

Ney, nā, (JOSEPH NAPOLÉON,) Prince of the Moskwa, (in French, "de la Moskowa,") a French general, born in Paris in 1803, was the eldest son of Marshal Ney. He served in Algeria in 1837–38, and entered the Chamber of Peers in 1841. After the revolution of 1848 he was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly, in which he was a partisan of Louis Napoleon. Died in 1857.

Ney, (MICHEL,) Duke of Elchingen, Prince of the Moskwa, a famous French marshal, born at Sarre-Louis in January, 1769, was the son of a cooper. He entered the army as a private in 1787, became adjutant-general in 1794, and a general of brigade in 1796. As general of division, he acquired a high reputation under Massena, in Switzerland and Germany, in 1799. In 1800 he passed into the army of Moreau, and contributed to the victory of Hohenlinden. He obtained a marshal's bâton in 1804. For an important victory over the Austrians at Elchingen, in October, 1805, he received the title of Duke of Elchingen. His impetuous courage rendered essential services at the battle of Jena, in 1806. In this year he took Magdeburg, the garrison of which amounted to about 20,000 men. He commanded an army in Spain in 1809, and obtained advantages at Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida in 1810. In the Russian campaign of 1812 he received from Bonaparte the appellation of the "Bravest of the Brave." He commanded the centre at the great battle of Borodino, or the Moskwa, from which he derived his title of Prince. In the retreat from Moscow, Marshal Ney commanded the rear-guard, and maintained his reputation by heroic conduct amidst the greatest disasters. "It was when danger was greatest and success most doubtful," says Alison, "that his courage was most conspicuous and his coolness most valuable." When summoned to capitulate, in November, 1812, he replied, "A marshal of France never surrenders!"

He took a prominent part in the battles of Lutzen, Bautzen, and Dresden, in 1813, and was defeated at Dennewitz by Bernadotte in September of that year. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, Ney submitted to Louis XVIII., who permitted him to retain his titles and military rank. In March, 1815, he received orders to lead an army against Napoleon, whom he promised to bring back in an iron cage. His moral courage, however, was not proof against the seductive offers of his former chief, to whom he transferred the army, as well as his own services. He fought with his usual resolution at Waterloo, where he led several charges of the Old Guard and had five horses shot under him. He was tried for treason by the court of the peers, and shot on the 7th of December, 1815.

"When the Parisians awoke," says Lamartine, "and found that Ney had been executed, bitter shame seized on every soul. . . . We must say, however, in the defence of the king and the ministers, that they were repugnant, from moderation, honour, and sensibility, to this useless, cruel, and shameful sacrifice. In their eyes, and in those of the impartial portion of the world, Ney was a great culprit, but his was a glorious life. His fault was among those which are condemned but pardoned. He had redeemed it beforehand by exploits which will be an eternal theme in the camps of France." ("History of the Restoration.")

Ney, (MICHEL LOUIS FÉLIX,) Duc d'Elchingen, a son of the preceding, was born in 1804. He served several campaigns in Algeria, and became a general of brigade in 1851. Died in 1854.

Ney, (NAPOLÉON HENRI EDGAR,) Prince of the Moskwa, a son of Marshal Ney, was born in Paris in 1812. He entered the army about 1830, was elected to the Legislative Assembly in 1850, became aide-de-camp to the emperor in 1852, and general of brigade in 1856. Died in 1882.

Neyen, nī'ĕn or nā'ôn', (AUGUSTE,) a Belgian historian, born at Luxemburg in 1809. Among his works is "Biographie Luxembourgeoise," (2 vols., 1861.)

Neyn, nīn, (PIETER,) a Dutch painter and architect, born at Leyden in 1597; died in 1639.

Nī-can'dẹr, [Gr. Νίκανδρος; Fr. NICANDRE, ne'kôNdr',] a celebrated Greek physician and poet, born near Colophon, is supposed to have flourished about 175–135 B.C. Of his numerous works only two have come down to us entire. These are two poems, entitled "Theriaca" and "Alexipharmaca." The latter treats of venomous animals and the remedies for their wounds. As a poet, he is eulogized by Cicero, but severely criticised by other writers. His works are said to be obscure and pedantic. Among his lost works was a poem of Georgics, which Virgil is said to have imitated.

Nī-çe'tas A-com-ĭ-nā'tus, ['Ακομινάτος,] surnamed CHONI'ATES, a Byzantine historian of the twelfth century, wrote a "History of the Greek Emperors from 1117 to 1203," in twenty-one books; also a "Description of the Monuments destroyed by the Franks at the Taking of Constantinople." Died about 1216.

Nich'ol, (JOHN,) LL.D., a son of Prof. J. P. Nichol, was born at Montrose, Scotland, September 8, 1833. He studied (1848–55) at the University of Glasgow, and at Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1861 became professor of English literature in the University of Glasgow. He published "Byron," (1880,) "Robert Burns," (1882,) "American Literature," (1882,) and other works in prose and verse. Died October 12, 1894.

Nich'ol, (JOHN PRINGLE,) a British astronomer and philosopher, born at Brechin, in Scotland, in 1804, was educated for the ministry. He gained distinction as a lecturer on science, and as a writer. About 1836 he was appointed professor of astronomy in the University of Glasgow. He published popular works entitled "The Architecture of the Heavens," (1836,) "The Stellar Heavens," "The Solar System," and a "Dictionary of the Physical Sciences." His style is vigorous and attractive. He wrote numerous articles for the "Imperial Dictionary of Biography." Died in 1859.

Nich'o-las [Lat. NICOLA'US; Fr. NICOLAS, ne'ko'lä'; It. NICCOLÒ, nĕk-ko-lo'; Ger. NIKOLAUS, nik'o-lŏwss'] I., POPE, succeeded Benedict III. in 858 A.D. Not long after, he was engaged in a broil with Photius, who had intruded himself into the patriarchal see of Constantinople, and the result was a schism between the Greek and Latin Churches. He died in 867, and was succeeded by Adrian II.

Nicholas I, (in Montenegrin, Nik'ị-ta,) Prince of Montenegro, (name in full NIKITA PETROVITCH NIEGOSH or NYEGOOSH,) was born October 7, 1841. In 1860 he succeeded his uncle Danilo. His reign has been signalized by bloody wars with Turkey. The Congress of Berlin, at the end of the Russo-Turkish war of 1876–78, more than doubled the area of his dominions. Nicholas at that time became an absolute and independent monarch. He has done much for popular education, and has the reputation of being no mean poet.

Nicholas II., POPE, (called GERARD OF BURGUNDY,) succeeded Stephen IX. in 1059. Under his rule a decree was passed concerning the method of electing popes. Nicholas bestowed upon Robert Guiscard the duchy of Apulia and Calabria as a fief of the Roman see. He died in 1061, and was succeeded by Alexander II.

Nicholas III. (GIOVANNI Gaetani—gä-ä-tä'nee) succeeded John XXI. as pope in 1277. He obtained from the emperor Rudolph of Germany the confirmation of the Exarchate of Ravenna, and other grants of territory, said to have been made by former emperors. He died in 1280, and was succeeded by Martin IV.

Nicholas IV., POPE, (called JEROME OF ASCOLI,) succeeded Honorius IV. in 1288. He wrote a number of commentaries on the Scriptures. He died in 1292, and was succeeded by Celestine V.

See J. ROSSI, (RUBEUS,) "Vita Nicolai Papæ IV.," 1761

Nicholas V. (called THOMAS OF SARZANA) succeeded Eugenius IV. in 1447. Having persuaded Felix V., who had been made pope by the Council of Bâle in 1439, to resign in his favour, he thus restored peace to the Western Church. He was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of the Vatican Library. Died in 1455, aged about fifty-seven.

* Some of the best French authorities are not consistent with themselves in regard to the spelling of this name. In the early part of the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale" the name, whenever referred to, appears to be invariably written with the accent on the second syllable,—NICÉRON,—but under the biographical notice it is spelled NICERON which is also the spelling of the "Biographie Universelle." But this fact will not by any means be deemed decisive by those who are aware of the exceeding negligence of most French writers in regard to marking the accent. It has become very common in France to omit the accent in certain names (e.g. PETION) in writing, but to pronounce the name as if spelled with an accent. (See note under "Petion" in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale.")

Nicholas [in Russian, NIKOLAI PAVLOVITCH, ne-kō-lā'e (or ne-ko-lī') pāv'lo-vitch] I., Emperor of Russia, born at or near Saint Petersburg in July, 1796, was the third son of Paul I. His mother was Mary of Würtemberg. He was instructed in the languages, sciences, etc. by the philologist Adelung and the counsellor Storch. He learned to speak French and German fluently. In 1817 he married a daughter of Frederick William, King of Prussia, who, on joining the Greek Church, changed her name to Alexandra. On the death of Alexander I., in December, 1825, Nicholas succeeded him without opposition from his elder brother, Constantine, who was notoriously unfit to reign, and who had been induced by Alexander to renounce his claim to the throne. His accession, however, was the occasion of a dangerous revolt among the troops of the capital, instigated by an extensive conspiracy, or secret society, the design of which was to make a radical change in the government. This revolt was not suppressed without much bloodshed, and many nobles implicated in the conspiracy were exiled to Siberia. This affair tended to confirm his despotic propensities.

His reign was signalized by a numher of important wars, beginning with one against Persia in 1827, followed by a war with Turkey in 1828–29. Both of these added new territory to the Russian empire. In 1830 began a great insurrection of the Poles, which it took two years to quell. The ambition of Nicholas next led him to attempt the conquest of Circassia, which he did not live to complete. In 1849 he joined his armies to those of Austria to aid in the suppression of the Hungarian patriots and the triumph of despotism.

Nicholas had long entertained ambitious designs respecting Turkey, which at length involved him in a disastrous war. In the spring of 1853 he demanded of the Sultan the protectorate of all the Turkish subjects who professed the Greek religion. The Sultan refused to submit to this demand, and France and England united to defend him against the aggressions of Russia. Hostilities commenced in October, 1853, but Nicholas was ill prepared for a war of such magnitude. In the spring of 1854 the Russian army besieged Silistria without success. In September the allied English and French armies landed in the Crimea, gained decisive victories at Alma and Inkerman, and commenced the long and famous siege of Sevastopol. In the mean time another English fleet gained victories in the Baltic, and threatened the capital of Russia. Nicholas was overtasked by the labours which his despotic policy imposed on him, and before the end of the war he died, on the 2d of March, 1855. He was succeeded by his son, Alexander II.

Nicholas II., Emperor of Russia, the grandson of Nicholas I. and son of Alexander III., was born at St. Petersburg, May 18, 1868. While heir-apparent to the throne, besides the numerous complimentary military honours bestowed upon him by foreign powers, he held the positions of commander-in-chief of all the Cossack troops, governor of the Cossacks of the Don and Kooban, colonel of several regiments of guards, and member of the Council of the Empire. He ascended the throne on the death of his father, November 1, 1894. Among the leading events of his reign were the alliance of Russia with France, the promulgation by him of a project for international peace and the reduction of European armaments, the building of the Siberian Railway, and the extension of Russian dominion over Manchuria.

Nich'o-las, (HENRY,) a fanatic, born at Münster or Leyden, founded about 1540 a sect called "The Family of Love." He pretended that he was superior to Christ.

Nich'o-las, SAINT, honoured as the guardian and patron of children, school-boys, captives, merchants, and sailors, and of many towns and countries, was a native of Patara, in Lycia, and became Bishop of Myra. He died in 340. Many curious legends illustrate his benevolence and good nature.

Nich'o-las, (WILSON CARY,) an American officer and statesman, served in the Revolutionary war, and was elected a Senator from Virginia in 1799. He became Governor of that State in 1814. Died in 1820.

Nich'olls, (FRANK,) a distinguished anatomist and physician, born in London in 1699. He married in 1743 a daughter of the celebrated Dr. Mead, and on the death of Sir Hans Sloane became physician to George II. He wrote several able scientific treatises, and was a Fellow of the Royal Society. Died in 1779.

Nich'ols, (EDWARD LEAMINGTON,) educator and scientist, was born of American parents at Leamington, England, in 1854. He studied in European universities, was a fellow of Johns Hopkins 1879–80, with Edison at Menlo Park 1880–81, professor of physics and astronomy, University of Kansas, 1883–87, and of physics at Cornell after 1887. He published "The Elements of Physics" and other works.

Nich'olls, (ICHABOD,) D.D., an American Unitarian divine, born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in 1784. He was the author of a treatise "On Natural Theology," and "Hours with the Evangelists," the latter published after his death. He was distinguished for his mathematical attainments, and was for a time vice-president of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died in 1859.

Nich'olls, (JOHN,) an English littérateur, born at Islington in 1744, was a partner of William Bowyer, the eminent printer. He became in 1778 one of the publishers of the "Gentleman's Magazine," and was subsequently editor of that journal for many years. He published, besides other works, the "History and Antiquities of Leicestershire," (6 vols., 1795–1811,) and "Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century," (8 vols., 1812–15.) Died in 1826.

Nichols, (JOHN BOWYER,) an archæologist, a son of the preceding, was born about 1780. He succeeded his father in business, and edited several volumes of the "Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth Century," which his father commenced. Died in 1863.

Nichols or Niccols, (RICHARD,) an English poet, born in London in 1584. He wrote "The Cuckow," a poem, (1607,) and published a new edition of "The Mirror for Magistrates," (1610,) to which he added a "Winter Night's Vision," and a piece on the Life of Queen Elizabeth.

Nich'ol-son, (ALFRED OSBORN POPE,) an American statesman and journalist, born in Williamson county, Tennessee, in 1808. He has been successively editor of the "Western Mercury," the "Nashville Union," and the "Washington Union," an organ of President Pierce. In 1857 he was elected to the United States Senate. He became chief justice of Tennessee, and died in 1876.

Nicholson, (EDWARD WILLIAM BYRON,) an English author, born at St. Helier's, Jersey, in 1849, librarian of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, after 1882. He published "The Christ-Child and Other Poems," (1877,) "The Rights of an Animal," (1879,) "The Pedigree of Jack," (1892,) "The Man with Two Souls," (1898,) etc.

Nich'ol-son, (HENRY ALLEYNE,) M.D., an English zoologist, born at Penrith, September 8, 1844. He was educated at the Universities of Göttingen and Edinburgh, and held biological professorships in the Universities of Toronto, (1871,) Durham, (1874,) Saint Andrew's, (1875,) and Aberdeen, (1882.) He published various geological works, a "Manual of Zoology," "Manual of Palæontology," etc. Died in 1899.

Nicholson, (JAMES,) an American naval officer, born at Chestertown, Maryland, in 1737; died about 1804. His brother SAMUEL attained the rank of commodore, and became commander of the frigate Constitution. Died in 1811.

Nich'ọl-sọn, (JOHN,) a British general, born in Ireland in 1821 or 1822. He served with distinction in the war against the Afghans and in the campaign against the Sikhs. In the Sepoy mutiny he commanded a column or division, and performed an important part in the capture of Delhi. He died of wounds received at Delhi in September, 1857.

Nicholson, (JOSEPH SHIELD,) a British author, born at Wrawley in 1850. In 1880 he became professor of political economy at Edinburgh. His writings embrace several works on economy, and three anonymous romances, "Thoth," "Toxar," and "A Dreamer of Dreams," (1888–90.)

Nicholson, (WILLIAM.) See NICOLSON.

Nicholson, (WILLIAM,) an English chemist and scientific writer, born in London about 1755. He published, among other works, a "Dictionary of Chemistry," (2 vols., 1795,) and a "Journal of Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, and the Arts," (5 vols., 1797–1800.) Died in 1815.

Nicholson, (WILLIAM,) a British portrait-painter, born at Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1784. He lived mostly at Edinburgh, and published "Portraits of Distinguished Living Characters of Scotland," (1818,) a series of etchings. Died at Edinburgh, August 16, 1844.

Nicholson, (WILLIAM RUFUS,) D.D., an American bishop, was born in Green county, Mississippi, January 8, 1822. He graduated at La Grange College, Alabama, in 1840, was a Methodist clergyman in New Orleans, 1843–46, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1847, and held rectorships in Cincinnati, Boston, and Newark. In 1874 he joined the "Reformed Episcopal Church" and became minister of a parish in Philadelphia. In 1876 he was made a bishop. He published various pamphlets, controversial and expository.

Nicias, nish'e-as, or Nik'ĭ-as, [Νικίας,] a celebrated Athenian general, was the son of Niceratus, who left him a large fortune. His moderate and cautious character and conservative principles identified him with the aristocratic party. On the death of Pericles he became a prominent opponent of Cleon, the democratic leader. By prudence rather than by skill, he generally obtained success in his earlier military operations against the Spartans. In 426 B.C. he commanded a successful expedition against Melos, and in 425 invaded Corinth, the army of which he defeated. Cleon, his principal rival, having died, Nicias exerted his influence in favour of peace, and a treaty was made between Athens and Sparta in 421 B.C. This was called the peace of Nicias. A long contest ensued between him and Alcibiades, the leader of the democracy, who wished to renew the war, and who prevailed in 415, when an expedition was sent against Syracuse, the ally of Sparta. Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus were chosen joint commanders; but the second was recalled before the fleet arrived at Syracuse. In the spring of 414 Nicias blockaded the port of Syracuse, seized the heights of Epipolæ, and had nearly enclosed the city on the land side by a wall, when Gylippus, the Spartan general, arrived. Nicias was disabled by ill health and wished to resign, but was compelled to retain the command. The Athenians were defeated in several actions on land and water, and the timidity or incapacity of Nicias caused the total loss of his large army. He was made prisoner, and put to death in 414 or 413 B.C.

Nicias, a celebrated Greek painter, born at Athens, flourished probably between 350 and 300 B.C. He was a pupil of Antidotus, and is also called the most eminent disciple of Euphranor. According to Pliny, he was employed by Praxiteles to colour or varnish marble statues, (in statuis circumlinendis.) This was probably in his youth, before he had attained celebrity. He painted chiefly in encaustic, and was very skilful in representing female figures. He excelled in design and chiaroscuro. His master-piece was a picture of the infernal regions as described by Homer, "Necromantia Homeri," which, says Plutarch, he refused to sell to Ptolemy of Egypt, although he was offered the enormous price of sixty talents. Among his other works were a "Calypso," a "Diana," and a "Hyacinthus."

Nicias, physician to Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, proposed to Fabricius, the Roman general, to poison his master for a sum of money. His treachery being disclosed by Fabricius, he was put to death.

Nī-coch'a-rēs, [Νικοχάρης,] an Athenian comic poet, was a son of the poet Philonides, and a contemporary of Aristophanes. He flourished about 375 B.C. His works are lost.

Nic'o-clēs, [Gr. Νικοκλῆς,] King of Salamis, in Cyprus, was a son of Evagoras I. He began to reign about 375 B.C. Isocrates wrote a panegyric on him.

Nic-o-de'mus, [Fr. NICODÈME, ne'ko'dȧm',] (ADAM BURCHARD SELLY,) a Russian monk and historian, of Danish origin. His chief work is "De Rossorum Hierarchia," (5 vols.) Died in 1746.

Nic'ọl, (ERSKINE,) a Scotch painter, born at Leith in 1825. He resided in Ireland for several years after 1846, and has made that island the scene of most of his pictures. He was elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1866.

Nic'ọl, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish natural philosopher, born about 1768. He invented the polarizing prism, and left important papers on light and kindred subjects. Died at Edinburgh in 1851.

Nicolai, nee'ko-li', (CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH,) a celebrated German littérateur, born at Berlin in 1733. Having at an early age acquired the friendship of Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn, he published, conjointly with the latter, the first four volumes of the "Library of Belles-Lettres," (1758.) "The Universal German Library," ("Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek,") in which he was assisted by several eminent writers, came out in 1792, in 106 vols. A continuation of this standard work was published in 1805, making in all 162 vols. Among his other writings may be named a "Description of Berlin and Potsdam," "Life and Opinions of Sebaldus Nothanker," (3 vols., 1773,) a "Tour through Germany and Switzerland," (12 vols., 1783,) and "Anecdotes of Frederick II.," (1788.) The conservative spirit of Nicolai's criticisms, and his hostility to all innovations in German literature, exposed him to the severe strictures of Goethe, Schiller, and other writers of the time. Died in 1811.

Nicolai, (ERNST ANTON,) a German medical writer, born at Sondershausen in 1722. He became professor at Jena in 1758, and wrote numerous works. Died in 1802.

Nicole, (PIERRE,) an eminent French theologian and philosopher, born at Chartres in 1625. He was a prominent member of the institution of Port-Royal, and an intimate friend of Arnauld, in conjunction with whom he wrote the treatise entitled "Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church concerning the Eucharist," (1664.) His most important work is a collection of treatises called "Moral Essays and Theological Instructions," (25 vols., 1671 et seq.) One of these, entitled "On the Means of Preserving Peace," is styled by Voltaire "a masterpiece of its kind, to which we can find nothing equal in antiquity." Among his other productions we may name his "Treatise on Human Faith," (1664,) and "Les Imaginaires et les Visionnaires," (2 vols., 1667.) Died in 1695.

Nicolini, ne'ko-lee'nee, the assumed name of ERNEST Nicolas, a French vocalist, born at Tours in 1834. After making successful appearances in opera in the principal cities, he took professional engagements with Madame Adelina Patti, whom he married on her divorce from the Marquis de Caux. Died in 1898.

Nicolini, the stage-name of NICOLINO Grimaldi, a famous Italian singer, born at Naples about 1673. His voice was originally a soprano, but sank to a magnificent contralto. After singing with great success in the principal Italian cities, he went to England in 1708, where he met with an enthusiastic reception. He is mentioned in the "Spectator" in Addison's humorous attacks on the Italian opera, and always with praise, though no man did more than Nicolini to foster a taste for this species of opera among the English. In 1717 he left England and returned to Italy, but is lost sight of after 1726.

Nicolini, ne-ko-lee'nee, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian littérateur, born at Brescia in 1788. He wrote a didactic poem "On the Culture of Cedars," and translated the tragedy of "Macbeth" into Italian. Died in 1855.

Nic-o-me'dēs [Gr. Νικομήδης; Fr. NICOMÈDE, ne'ko'mȧd'] I., King of Bithynia, began to reign at the death of his father, 278 B.C. He was opposed by his brother Zipœtes, and took into his service an army of Gauls, by whose aid he gained the victory. He founded the great city of Nicomedia. Died about 250 B.C.

See DROYSEN, "Hellenismus."

Nic-o-me'dēs II. Ē-piph'a-nēs [Fr. NICOMÈDE ÉPIPHANE, ne'ko'mȧd' ȧ'pe'fȧn'] was a son of Prusias II., who sent him to Rome as a hostage. He gained the favour of the Roman senate, and excited the jealousy of his father, who sent an agent to assassinate him. Informed of this design, Nicomedes dethroned and killed Prusias in 149 B.C. He was afterwards an ally of the Romans. Died about 90 B.C.

See JUSTIN, books xxxiv., xxxvii., etc.

Nicomedes III., surnamed PHILOP'ATOR, was a son of the preceding, whom he succeeded in 91 B.C. In the Mithridatic war, which ensued soon after, he was an ally of Rome, but, having been defeated, he was driven from his kingdom. Bithynia was subsequently restored to Nicomedes, who, dying without children, (74 B.C.,) left it to the Romans.

Nicomedes, a Greek geometer, the inventor of the curve called the "conchoid," flourished about 100 B.C.

Nī'con [Νίκων] OF PERGAMUS, a Greek architect and geometer, was the father of the celebrated Galen. Died about 150 A.D.

Niebuhr, nee'boor, (BARTHOLD GEORG,) a celebrated German historian and critic, born at Copenhagen on the 27th of August, 1776, was the son of Carstens Niebuhr, noticed below. He had a great facility for learning languages, and he read the works of Shakspeare in the original about the age of seven. In 1794 he entered the University of Kiel, where he profoundly studied Roman law, history, philosophy, and ancient languages. He was appointed secretary to Count Schimmelmann, minister of finance at Copenhagen, in 1796, made a tour in Great Britain in 1798, and became an assessor in the council of commerce at Copenhagen in 1800. In the last-named year he married Amalie Behrens. In 1806 he passed into the service of Prussia, as joint director of commerce, and in 1809 he became privy councillor and member of the commission of finances at Berlin. Although he performed these various functions with much ability and success, he soon retired from political life, and in 1810 was chosen professor of history in the University of Berlin. His lectures on Roman history, published in 1811–12, announced the important discoveries and original ideas which have effected a great revolution in the principles of Roman history, and constitute his chief title to durable celebrity.

During the war of liberation (1813) he attended the head-quarters of the allies, and was employed in negotiating loans. In 1816 he went as Prussian ambassador to Rome, where he remained until 1822 and pursued with ardour his researches in the history of ancient Rome and the study of philology. He became a resident of Bonn in 1823, and in 1825 opened there a course of lectures on history and Roman antiquities. In 1827 he published the first volume of a revised edition of his "History of Rome," ("Römische Geschichte,") which is considered the most original and profound work on ancient history that any modern has produced. The third and last volume appeared in 1832. The author died at Bonn in January, 1831, leaving a son, Marcus, who held a high position in the Prussian civil service. Niebuhr had refused several titles of nobility. His character was eminently truthful, upright, and generous. He had noble features, and a graceful facility of elocution. His attainments as a critic and philologist were of the highest order.* He spoke all the languages of Europe, and was master of the Hebrew, Greek, Arabic, and Persian. Among his principal works are an edition of the Byzantine Historians, (1828,) "Short Historical and Philological Treatises," (1828,) "Lectures on Ancient Ethnography and Geography," and "Lectures on Ancient History." In 1838 appeared an interesting collection of his Letters, with memoirs of his life, edited by Madame Hensler, ("Lebensnachrichten über B. G. Niebuhr," etc., 3 vols.) His reputation as a historian continued to increase after his death, though several of his positions are controverted by eminent critics. He rejected as fabulous many stories which other historians had credited, and aimed to construct a fabric of rational probability out of the confused mass of traditions, conjectures, and mythical legends. "He would have been the first writer of his time," says Macaulay, "if his talent for communicating truths had borne any proportion to his talent for investigating them." (Preface to "Lays of Ancient Rome.")

Niebuhr," 1835; "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1833, and July, 1852; "Quarterly Review," article on "Early Roman History," vol. xxvii. and vol. xxxii., (by ARNOLD;) "Westminster Review" for May, 1843; "Quarterly Review" for September, 1840; "Foreign Quarterly Review" for June, 1828, and July, 1831; "Fraser's Magazine" for July and December, 1852; "North American Review" for April, 1823, (by EDWARD EVERETT;) "North British Review" for August, 1852; "Westminster Review" for December, 1843, (by G. H. LEWES.)

Niebuhr, (CARSTENS or KARSTENS,) a German traveller of distinguished talent and energy, was born at Lüdingworth, in Hanover, in 1733. He entered the Danish service as lieutenant-engineer in 1760, and was appointed by Frederick V. in 1761 to accompany a scientific expedition to Arabia. Soon after their arrival at Mocha, Von Haven, one of the company, died, and within a year Niebuhr had the misfortune to lose his three remaining companions. He now adopted the diet of the Arabians, and his health, which had previously suffered, continued good during the rest of his journey. He spent six years in the country, taking upon himself all the labours of the mission, and in 1767 returned to Denmark. His "Description of Arabia" came out in 1772. The accuracy, research, and freedom from exaggeration which characterize this production have caused it to be regarded as a standard work. In 1778 he brought out "Travels in Arabia and the Surrounding Countries." In addition to the above, he edited and published the "Flora Egyptiaco-Arabica," and "Descriptions of Animals" by Forskål, the naturalist of the expedition. Niebuhr was a councillor of state, and a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Died in 1815.

See B. G. NIEBUHR, "Leben Carstens Niebuhr's," 1817; "Monthly Review," vol. liii., 1776, (Appendix.)

Niebuhr, von, fon nee'boor, (MARCUS,) a son of Barthold G. Niebuhr, was born at Rome about 1817. He was carefully educated by his father, who declared his determination that he should believe in the letter of the Old and New Testament, and said, "I shall nurture in him from his infancy a firm faith in all I have lost or feel uncertain about." He obtained several high offices in the Prussian government. He was opposed to the Liberal party in politics. Died in 1860.

Niederer, nee'dẹh-rẹr, (JEAN,) a Swiss teacher, born at Appenzell in 1778, published a treatise on the system of Pestalozzi. Died in 1843.

Nielly, ne'ạ'le', (JOSEPH MARIE,) BARON, a French naval officer, born at Brest in 1751, served against the English in several campaigns, and became vice-admiral in 1815. Died in 1833.

Nielson, neel'son, (JULIA,) an English actress, was born at London in 1868. Her first appearance on the stage was made in 1888. She toured widely in Great Britain and the United States, her greatest success being as Rosalind in "As You Like It." She married Fred Terry, a well-known actor.

Niem, neem, (THIERRY,) a German historian, born near Paderborn, became Bishop of Cambray in 1396. He wrote the "Lives of the Roman Pontiffs," and other historical works, in Latin. Died about 1417.

Niemann, nee'mân, (ALBERT,) a German tenor-singer, born at Erxleben in 1831. He has won a good reputation in Germany, but has only once sung outside of his native country, on the occasion of the unsuccessful production of "Tannhäuser" in Paris in 1861.

Niemann, nee'mân, (AUGUST CHRISTIAN HEINRICH,) a Danish publicist and writer on political economy, born at Altona in 1761; died in 1832.

Niemann, nee'mân, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German physician, born in Anhalt-Dessau in 1764, was the author of several medical works. Died in 1846.

Niemcewicz, ne-ĕm-tsā'vitch, (JULIAN URSIN,) a celebrated Polish statesman, historian, and poet, born in Lithuania in 1757. Being appointed a deputy to the Constitutional Diet, he had the principal share in drawing up the "Constitution of the 3d of May," 1791, and about the same time became one of the editors of a popular journal called "Gazeta Narodowa." After the battle of Maciejowice, he was made prisoner with Kosciusko and confined in the fortress of Saint Petersburg, from which they were released on the accession of Paul, in 1796. He accompanied Kosciusko to America in 1797, and in 1800 married Mrs. Livingston Kean, a lady of New York. He returned to Europe on the entrance of Napoleon into Poland, and when that country was united with Russia he was appointed by the emperor Alexander president of the committee of the constitution, and perpetual secretary of the senate. A short time previous to the fall of Warsaw he visited England, and then went to Paris, where he died in 1841. His principal works are "Historical Songs of Poland," "History of the Reign of Sigismund III.," "Memoirs towards the Ancient History of Poland," and "John of Tenczyn," a romance. He also wrote several dramas, which were successful, and made some translations from the English poets.

See BROCKHAUS, "Conversations-Lexikon."

* It is interesting to know that he who was perhaps the most thorough and searching of all historical critics, and whose intellect, as he tells us himself, "early took a skeptical direction," felt himself nevertheless obliged to accept the Gospel narratives as true history in all essential points. He says, "He whose earthly life and sorrows were depicted had for me a perfectly real existence, and His whole history had the same reality even if it were not related with literal exactness in any single point. Hence, also, the fundamental fact of miracles, which, according to my conviction, must be conceded, unless we adopt the not merely incomprehensible, but absurd, hypothesis that the Holiest was a deceiver and His disciples either dupes or liars, and that deceivers had preached a holy religion, in which self-renunciation is everything, and in which there is nothing tending towards the erection of a priestly rule,—nothing that can be acceptable to vicious inclinations. As regards a miracle in the strictest sense, it really only requires an unprejudiced and penetrating study of nature to see that those related are as far as possible from absurdity, and a comparison with legends, or the pretended miracles of other religions, to perceive by what a different spirit they are animated." (Niebuhr's "Letters," vol. i. p. 340, Letter 148.)

Niemeyer, nee'mī'ẹr, (AUGUST HERMANN,) a German theologian, born at Halle in 1754. He was appointed in 1799 director of the charitable institutions founded by A. H. Francke, and became in 1808 chancellor and perpetual rector of the University of Halle. He wrote educational and religious works in prose and verse, and was highly esteemed for his virtue and learning. Died in 1828.

Niemojowski, ne-ĕm-o-yov'skee, (JOSEPH,) a Polish patriot, born about 1760, was appointed general of the palatinate of Posnania. He was killed at the battle of Polotzk, in 1813.

Niemojowski, (VINCENT,) born near Kalisch in 1784, distinguished himself by his zeal in the cause of Poland, and held for a time the post of minister of the interior at Warsaw. Died in 1834.

Niepce, ne-ĕps', (JOSEPH NICÉPHORE,) a French chemist and inventor of photography, born at Châlons-sur-Saône in 1765. He served in the army in 1792–95. About 1814 he began his researches on the action of light on prepared surfaces. In 1822 he obtained copies of engravings from polished metallic plates covered with a bituminous varnish. He gave the name of Héliographie to this art. He formed a partnership with Daguerre in 1829. It is stated that Niepce was the first to fix permanently images formed by the camera. Died in 1833.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Niepce de Saint-Victor, ne-ĕps' dẹh săn' vĕk'tor', (CLAUDE FÉLIX ABEL,) a French chemist and photographer, a nephew of the preceding, was born near Châlons-sur-Saône in 1805. He entered the army, in which he gained the rank of captain. Having applied himself to the task of perfecting the invention of his uncle, he announced in 1847 to the Academy of Sciences an important discovery of a method of obtaining images on glass prepared with starch or albumen. He also invented a process of heliographic engraving on metal covered with a varnish which consists chiefly of benzine. In 1854 he was appointed commandant of the Louvre. He explained his discoveries in numerous memoirs, which he published collectively under the title of "Photographic Researches," (1855.) Died in April, 1870.

See a "Memoir of Niepce de Saint-Victor," prefixed to the work just named, by M. E. LACAN; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" "British Quarterly Review" for July and October, 1866.

Nieremberg, nee'rẹm-bĕrg', [Lat. NIEREMBER'GIUS, (JOHANN EUSEBIUS,) a learned Spanish Jesuit, of German extraction, born at Madrid about 1590. He was the author of numerous theological and miscellaneous works, in Latin and Spanish; among the principal of these is his "Historia Naturæ maxime peregrinæ," (1635,) being an account of the natural history of the Indies. Died in 1658.

Niethammer, neet'hăm'mẹr, (FRIEDRICH IMMANUEL,) a German philosopher, born at Beilstein, in Würtemberg, in 1766. He was associated with Fichte as editor of the "Philosophisches Journal" at Jena. Died in 1846.

Nieto, ne-ā'to, (DAVID,) a learned Jewish rabbi, born at Venice in 1654; died in 1728.

North, (CHRISTOPHER.) See WILSON, (JOHN.)

North, (DUDLEY,) LORD, an English writer and politician, born in 1581, was an adherent of the Parliament during the civil war. He died in 1666, leaving a collection of poems and prose works.

North, (DUDLEY,) LORD, son of the preceding, born in 1604, wrote the "Life of Edward, Lord North," and several other works. Died in 1677.

See R. NORTH, "Lives of the Norths."

North, (Sir DUDLEY,) an English merchant and able financier, born in 1641, was a brother of Lord-Keeper Guildford. In his youth he passed many years in mercantile pursuits at Smyrna and Constantinople. Having acquired wealth, he returned home, (1680,) and became a London merchant. "He had meditated deeply on the philosophy of trade," says Macaulay, "and thought out, by degrees, a complete and admirable theory," substantially the same as that of Adam Smith. He was chosen a commissioner of customs and of the treasury, and elected to Parliament. About 1685 he was the person on whom the lord treasurer chiefly relied for the conduct of financial business in the lower House. He wrote a "Voyage from Smyrna, with an Account of Turkey." Died in 1691.

See ROGER NORTH, "Life of Sir Dudley North," 1740–42.

North, (Sir EDWARD,) a distinguished English lawyer under the reigns of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary. Died in 1564.

North, (FRANCIS,) Baron Guildford or Guilford, commonly styled LORD-KEEPER GUILFORD, was the son of Lord Dudley North, and was born in 1637. About 1655 he entered as a student the Middle Temple. Soon after he was called to the bar he went on the Norfolk circuit, where his family interest lay, and relied for success on sycophantic arts. He was appointed solicitor-general in 1671, attorney-general in 1673, and chief justice of the common pleas in 1675. He was the obsequious servant of the court, and an ultra-royalist, or Tory, in politics. "He was a party," says Macaulay, "to some of the foulest judicial murders recorded in our history." In 1682 he obtained the great seal, with the title of lord keeper. On the accession of James II. (February, 1685) the great seal was left in his custody, but he was superseded in his political functions by his rival, Lord Jeffreys. Lord Guilford died in September, 1685, leaving his title to his son Francis.

North, (FREDERICK,) second Earl of Guildford, an English Tory statesman, better known as LORD NORTH, was born in 1733. He was a son of Francis, Earl of Guildford, who died in 1790, and was a great-grandson of the lord keeper of that name. In 1763 he was chosen one of the lords of the treasury. He became chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons in 1769. He was a successful debater, and, on account of his wit and suavity of temper, a great favourite with the House. He also gained the extraordinary favour of the king by his readiness to accept the responsibility of prime minister in the emergency which arose on the resignation of the Duke of Grafton in 1770. The principal event of his administration was the American war, which he prosecuted with great pertinacity. Though fiercely assailed by Burke, Fox, and Lord Chatham, he maintained his power with eminent tact and ability, and was supported by large majorities in the House, until March, 1782, when he resigned, after the surrender of Cornwallis had terminated the American war. He retained, however, the royal favour until he entered into the ill-omened coalition with Fox against the Shelburne ministry. In March, 1783, Lord North became secretary of state in the coalition ministry of which the Duke of Portland was the nominal head. He was dismissed in December, 1783, when Pitt became premier. In 1790 he succeeded to the earldom of Guildford. Died in 1792. "As a statesman," says Lord Brougham, "his merits are confessedly far inferior to those which clothed him as a debater and a man. The American war is the great blot on his fame."

See LORD BROUGHAM, "Statesmen of the Time of George III.;" MACAULAY, "Essays," article "Chatham;" LODGE, "Portraits of Illustrious Personages."

North, (GEORGE,) an English antiquary, born in London in 1710, published several treatises on numismatics. Died in 1772.

North, (JOHN,) D.D., a son of Lord Dudley North, was born in 1645. He became professor of Greek at Cambridge, and published editions of several works of Plato. Died in 1683.

See ROGER NORTH, "Life of John North."

North, (ROGER,) a younger son of Lord Dudley North, and a brother of Sir Dudley North, was born about 1650. He studied law, and became steward of the courts to Archbishop Sheldon. He was author of several works, the most important of which is "The Lives of Francis North, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, Sir Dudley North, and Rev. John North," (1740–42.) This is written in an affected, pedantic style, but contains valuable matter. Died in 1733.

See ROGER NORTH, "Lives of the Norths."

North, (Sir THOMAS,) an English writer, translated "The Dial of Princes" from the French, and the "Moral Philosophy" of Doni from the Italian. He also made the first translation of Plutarch's "Lives" into English, (1579.) He died after 1579.

North'brook, (THOMAS GEORGE Baring,) EARL OF, an English statesman, a son of Sir Francis, Lord Baring, was born in 1826, and graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1846. He was in Parliament, 1857–66, in 1866 succeeded to the peerage, and, after holding important offices under Mr. Gladstone, served (1872–76) as Viceroy of India. In 1880 he was made first lord of the admiralty. In 1884 he was placed at the head of the British commission governing Egypt.

North'cote, (JAMES,) an English artist, celebrated as a portrait and historical painter, born at Plymouth in 1746. Having studied under Sir Joshua Reynolds, he visited Italy in 1777, and, after his return, was made a Royal Academician. Among his best productions are "Hubert and Arthur" and "The Murder of the Princes in the Tower." He also published "The Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," (1813,) and several able treatises on Art. Died in 1831.

Northcote, (Sir STAFFORD,) an English conservative politician, born in London in 1818. He became president of the board of trade in 1866, secretary for India in 1867, and chancellor of the exchequer under Disraeli in 1874. In 1885 he was created Earl of Iddesleigh, and made first lord of the treasury, and afterwards secretary for foreign affairs. Died in 1887.

North'end, (CHARLES,) an American educator, born at Newbury, Massachusetts, April 2, 1814. He was educated at Amherst College, and attained distinction as a teacher. He published "Teacher and Parent," and "The Teacher's Assistant," besides various compilations, including a series of school-books, ("The National Orator," "Little Speaker," etc.) Died August 7, 1895.

Northington, LORD. See HENLEY, (ROBERT.)

Nor-thum'bẽr-land, (ALGERNON PERCY,) tenth EARL OF, born in 1602, was a son of Henry, ninth earl. He was lord high admiral under Charles I. Died in 1668.

Northumberland, (ALGERNON PERCY,) DUKE OF, a British peer, born in 1792. He entered the navy in his youth, and served against the French. In 1847 he inherited the dukedom at the death of his brother Henry. He obtained the rank of rear-admiral about 1850. Died in 1865.

Northumberland, DUKE OF. See DUDLEY, (JOHN.)

Northumberland, (HENRY PERCY,) first EARL OF, an English commander, was a son of Henry Percy. His mother was Mary, a daughter of the Earl of Lancaster, and a great-granddaughter of King Henry III. He was a friend of Wycliffe, the Reformer. In 1377 he was created Earl of Northumberland by Richard II. He was one of the chief agents of the revolution which raised Henry IV. to the throne in 1399. In 1402 Percy defeated the Scotch under Douglas at Homildon Hill. He united with his son Hotspur in rebellion against the king in 1403, and was killed in battle in 1408.

Northumberland, (HENRY PERCY,) second EARL OF, was a son of Hotspur. He succeeded his grandfather, the first earl, in 1408, and was restored to the earldom by Henry V. In the civil war of the Roses he fought for the house of Lancaster, and was killed at the battle of Saint Alban's, in 1455. His son, the third earl, fell at the battle of Towton, in 1460.

Northumberland, (HENRY PERCY,) ninth EARL OF, surnamed THE WIZARD, born in 1563, was a son of Henry, the eighth earl, who died in the Tower in 1585. He commanded a ship in the battle against the Invincible Armada in 1588. He was a cousin of Thomas Percy, an accomplice in the Gunpowder Plot, (1605,) and, although the earl himself was a Protestant, he was confined many years in the Tower on suspicion. He acquired the appellation of "Wizard" by his study of occult sciences in prison. Died in 1632.

Northumberland, (HUGH PERCY,) DUKE OF, born in 1742, was a son of Sir Hugh Smithson, who was authorized to take the name of Percy. He entered the army, served at Bunker Hill, (1775,) and gained the rank of general. In 1786 he inherited the title of duke. Died in 1817.

See BURKE, "Peerage;" "Gentleman's Magazine," 1817.

Northumberland, (HUGH PERCY,) DUKE OF, son of the preceding, was born in 1785, and inherited his father's title in 1817. He favoured the Tory party. He was a liberal patron of science, and was much interested in botany and horticulture. Died in 1847.

Nor'ton, (ANDREWS,) D.D., an eminent American theologian and scholar, born at Hingham, Massachusetts, in 1786. He graduated in 1804 at Harvard College, and in 1813 succeeded Dr. Channing as biblical lecturer in that institution. He filled the chair of Dexter professor of sacred literature at Harvard from 1819 till 1830. His most important work is entitled "Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels," (3 vols., 1837–44.) He was for a time editor of the "General Repository and Review," published at Cambridge, and contributed many able articles to the religious and literary periodicals of the time. Among these may be named articles on "Franklin" and "Byron," in the "North American Review." In his theological views Dr. Norton was a Unitarian of the conservative school. He married a daughter of Samuel Eliot, of Boston. Died at Newport in 1853. He left a "Translation of the Gospels," published in 1856. "He displayed," says R. W. Griswold, "exact and comprehensive learning and a style singularly clear, compact, and beautiful." ("Prose Writers of America.") He also wrote poems which were much admired.

Nor'ton, (CAROLINE ELIZABETH SARAH,) an eminent English writer, born in 1808, was a granddaughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. She received a superior education, and in her seventeenth year wrote a volume of poetry entitled "The Sorrows of Rosalie," which was published anonymously, (1829.) In 1827 she was married to the Hon. George Chapple Norton; but this union proved most unfortunate, and a divorce took place between the parties in 1836. She had published in 1830 her poem of "The Undying One," which was received with great favour. It was succeeded by "A Voice from the Factories," (1836,) "The Dream, and other Poems," (1840,) "The Child of the Islands," (1845,) and "Aunt Carry's Ballads," (1847.) She also wrote a romance, entitled "Stuart of Dunleith," (1847,) and "Tales and Sketches in Prose and Verse," (1850,) many of which are remarkable for their fidelity to nature, pathos, and intensity of feeling. Among her more recent works are a "Letter to the Queen on Lord Cranworth's Marriage and Divorce Bill," (1855,) "Lives of the Sheridans," "Lady of La Garaye," (1861,) and "Lost and Saved," (1863.) Mrs. Norton is described by Mrs. Sedgwick, in her "Letters from Abroad," as the perfection of intellectual and physical beauty, uniting masculine force with feminine delicacy. Died June 15, 1877. Her second husband was Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell.

Norton, (CHARLES ELIOT,) an American author, a son of Andrews Norton, already noticed, was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, November 16, 1827. He graduated at Harvard College in 1846, visited India, travelling extensively in the East, was an editor of the "North American Review" 1864–68, and became professor of art history in Harvard College in 1874. He wrote "Notes of Travel and Study in Italy," (1860,) "The New Life of Dante," (1867,) "Church-Building in the Middle Ages in Italy," (1880,) "The Divine Comedy of Dante," (1891,) etc.

Norton, (CHARLES LEDYARD,) an American author, born at Farmington, Connecticut, in 1837, graduated at Yale in 1859. He served in the civil war, and was afterwards successively editor of "The Christian Union," "Domestic Monthly," "American Canoeist," "Outing," etc. He published "A Handbook of Florida," "Canoeing in Kanuckia," (with John Habberton,) and several maritime and military novels.

Norton, (Lady FRANCES,) an English moralist and writer, born about 1650, was the wife of Sir George Norton. She wrote "Memento Mori," and "The Applause of Virtue," (1705.) Died in 1720.

Norton, (JOHN,) a learned Puritan divine and theological writer, born in Hertfordshire, England, in 1606, emigrated in 1635 to America, and became a minister at Boston. Died in 1663.

Norton, (JOHN P.,) an American chemist, was professor of agricultural chemistry at Yale College. Died in 1851.

Norton, (SIDNEY AUGUSTUS,) an American chemist, born at North Bloomfield, Ohio, January 11, 1835. He graduated at Union College in 1856, and studied at Bonn, Leipsic, and Heidelberg. In 1873 he became professor of chemistry in the Ohio State University. His works include "Natural Philosophy," (1869,) "Physics," (1875,) "Inorganic Chemistry," (1878,) and "Organic Chemistry," (1884.)

Norton, (THOMAS,) an English Calvinistic writer, born in Bedfordshire in the sixteenth century, published some tracts against popery. He is also said to have assisted Sackville in his tragedy of "Ferrex and Porrex."

See WARTON, "History of English Poetry;" ELLIS, "Specimens of the Early English Poets."

Nörvi (nör've) or Nor, written also Narfi, [etymology doubtful,] a giant mentioned in the "Edda" as the first of all the inhabitants of Jötunheim. He had a daughter named Night, who was married to Anar or Onar.* The offspring of this union was the Earth. She afterwards became the wife of Delling or Dellinger, (i.e. the "Dawn,") and bore to him a bright and beautiful son called Day. Then Odin took Night and Day and placed them in heaven, and gave them two horses and two cars, that they might journey in succession round the world. Night rides first with her horse, called Rimfaxi or Hrimfaxi, (hrim- (or hreem-) făk'se,—that is, "Frosty-mane,") who every morning bedews the earth with foam from his bit. The horse of Day is named Skinfaxi, (or "Shining-mane,") because his radiant mane sends forth the light which illuminates heaven and earth.

He had a high reputation for learning, and made numerous translations from the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. His version of the Psalms is esteemed one of the most important monuments of early German literature. Died in 1022.

Not'man, (JOHN,) a distinguished architect, born in Edinburgh, Scotland, July 22, 1810. In 1831 he emigrated to the United States, and settled in Philadelphia, where he continued to reside for the rest of his life. He laid out the grounds of Laurel Hill Cemetery, designed all the architectural embellishments, and superintended their execution. He devoted himself particularly to church architecture, in which department he had few if any superiors in the United States. He was distinguished for his thorough acquaintance with mediæval architecture. He possessed great enthusiasm for his art, as well as poetic sensibility, and in his works he seemed to address himself not so much to the senses as to the soul. He died March 3, 1865. Among his chief works may be mentioned Saint Mark's Church, in Locust Street, regarded as among the very best specimens of the Gothic style in America, the façade of the Roman Catholic cathedral on Logan Square, and the Church of the Holy Trinity, near Walnut and Nineteenth Streets, of which the noble doorway is especially admired.

Novat. See NOVATUS.

Novatian, no-vā'she-an, [Lat. NOVATIA'NUS; Fr. NOVATIEN, no'vȧ'se-ȧN',] the founder of a sect called Novatians. He became a presbyter of the Church at Rome, and insisted on a rigorous enforcement of the discipline against the Lapsi,—i.e. those members of the Church who under the pressure of persecution had relapsed into idolatry or had been guilty of apostasy. On this question the Church was divided into two parties, which in 251 A.D. elected two rival bishops of Rome, Novatian and Cornelius, the latter of whom advocated greater laxity or charity in the treatment of the weak brethren. Novatian was condemned by a general Council held at Rome, and his rival obtained the office. The Novatians became numerous, and existed for more than a century as a separate sect. Some writers confound him with Novatus, mentioned below.

Between 1831 and 1856 he constructed a great number of these instruments, which were largely exported. Died in 1868.

Oberkampf, o'bẹr-kămpf', (CHRISTOPH PHILIPP,) a distinguished German artisan, born at Weissenbach in 1738. Having removed to France, he established at Jouy the first manufactory of printed cottons, (1759.) He brought this art to a degree of excellence hitherto unknown, and conferred an immense benefit upon his adopted country. He received from Napoleon the cross of the legion of honour. Died in 1815.

Oberlin, o'bẹr-lin, [Ger. pron. o'bĕr-leen'; Fr. pron. o'bĕr'lăn',] (JEAN FRÉDÉRIC,) an eminent philanthropist and reformer, born at Strasburg in 1740. In compliance with his father's wishes, he studied theology, instead of embracing the military profession, for which he had a strong inclination. He became in 1766 Protestant pastor of the Steinthal, or Ban de la Roche, a barren and rocky valley in Alsace, the inhabitants of which, owing to their country having been repeatedly laid waste during the French and German wars, were in a state of wretched poverty and ignorance. Oberlin now devoted himself to the reform which had been begun by his predecessor, Stouber, and, by his energy and mildness, succeeded in overcoming the prejudices of the people, who at first opposed all innovations. Besides great improvements in agriculture and the mechanical arts, he introduced many new employments, such as cotton-spinning, weaving, and straw-plaiting. He founded schools, to which he gave competent teachers, originated infant-schools, and took upon himself the principal religious instruction of his parishioners. So highly was Oberlin esteemed for the excellence of his character, and so deep was the sense of the benefits he had conferred, that during the troubles of the French Revolution the Ban de la Roche remained undisturbed; and he received from Louis XVIII. the cross of the legion of honour, (1819.) After the death of his wife, (1784,) Oberlin was assisted in his benevolent labours by his housekeeper, Louisa Schepler, formerly a servant in his family. She obtained from the French Academy, in 1829, one of the Montyon Prizes of Virtue, (five thousand francs.) Oberlin died in 1826, after a short illness, at the age of eighty-six.

O'Brī'ẹn, an Irish family of rank, descended from the famous chieftain Brian Boroimhe, who was slain at the battle of Clontarf, in 1014. MURROUGH O'BRIEN was created in 1800 Marquis of Thomond. Died in 1808. His nephew, JAMES O'BRIEN, Marquis of Thomond, served as a naval officer against the French, and in 1847 was made an admiral. Sir LUCIUS O'BRIEN, born in 1800, became lord lieutenant of Clare in 1843. He was twice chosen a member of Parliament for Clare, and was a zealous advocate of conservative principles. His brother, WILLIAM SMITH O'BRIEN, born in 1803, was elected to Parliament for the county of Limerick in 1832. Here he became an earnest coadjutor of O'Connell in the Repeal movement. He was afterwards the leader of a party called "Young Ireland," which, not satisfied with the legal agitation of O'Connell, advocated a forcible separation from England. Soon after the French revolution of 1848 he visited Paris, but, disappointed in his hopes of assistance from France, he returned to Dublin, where he summoned a national convention of three hundred members. This assembly was prohibited by the government, and O'Brien, with other leaders, was arrested. He was condemned to death; but this sentence was afterwards commuted to banishment, and in 1849 he was sent to Australia. He was subsequently pardoned. Died in 1864.

O'Brien, (FITZ-JAMES,) an American littérateur, of Irish birth. Born in 1829, he emigrated to this country in 1852, and soon became a well-known contributor to magazine literature. On the breaking out of the rebellion he enlisted in the Union army, and in February, 1862, died of a wound received in battle. A collection of his tales and poems, with a biographical sketch, was issued by William Winter.

O'Brien, (HENRY,) an Irish scholar, born in the county of Kerry about 1800. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1831. He published the "Round Towers of Ireland," (1834.) Died at Hanwell, England, June 28, 1835.

O'Con'nell, (DANIEL,) a famous Irish orator and political agitator, born near Cahirciveen, Kerry, in August, 1775, was educated as a Roman Catholic at Saint-Omer, in France. He entered Lincoln's Inn as a student of law in 1794, and was admitted to the bar in 1798. He quickly attained the foremost rank in his profession, and became pre-eminent as the advocate of Catholic emancipation,—i.e. the relief of Catholics from political disabilities. In the promotion of this cause he entirely discouraged a resort to physical force. He married his cousin, Mary O'Connell, about 1802. In 1823 he founded the Catholic Association. He was elected a member of Parliament for Clare in 1828, and refused to take the oath which was designed expressly to exclude Roman Catholics from the House. This affair caused a violent excitement and agitation, which resulted in the passage of the bill for Catholic emancipation in 1829, and O'Connell then took his seat in the House of Commons. He represented Dublin in Parliament from 1832 to 1835, and from 1837 to 1841. Having given up his lucrative practice to devote himself to legislative duties, he was indemnified by an annual subscription raised by his political friends under the name of "rent." About 1840 he commenced an agitation for the repeal of the union, on which subject he made speeches at monster meetings in Ireland in 1842 and 1843. He was arrested, tried, and found guilty of sedition or conspiracy, for which he was sentenced in 1844 to imprisonment for one year, and fined two thousand pounds. This judgment was reversed by the House of Lords. He supported the Whig ministry which came into power in 1846, after which he witnessed a decline of his influence in Ireland and the rise of dissensions among his followers. He died at Genoa in May, 1847, in the course of a journey to Rome.

O'Con'nor, (ARTHUR,) an Irish general, born at Bandon, near Cork, in 1767, was a Protestant. He joined the society of United Irishmen, who sent him on a secret mission to France, where he negotiated with General Hoche about the liberation of Ireland. In 1797 or 1798 he was tried on a charge of treason, and acquitted. He entered the French service, and became a general of division in 1804. About 1807 he married Elisa, a daughter of the famous Condorcet. Died in 1852.

See THOMAS MOORE, "Life and Death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald," 1831; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

O'Connor, (FEARGUS,) the celebrated leader of the English Chartists, was born near Cork, in Ireland, in 1796. In 1832 he became a member of Parliament for the county of Cork, and acquired great popularity with the radicals. Dissatisfied with the moderate policy of O'Connell, he advocated the rights of the working-class, whom he succeeded in uniting into a numerous party called Chartists. In 1838 they summoned a national convention in London, in order to prepare for a general insurrection. In November, 1839, after a sanguinary conflict at Newport, the Chartists were dispersed by the government troops, and many of their leaders taken and transported. O'Connor, however, who had carefully avoided any infringement of the law, escaped, and soon after founded a journal called "The Northern Star," which obtained an immense circulation. In 1843 he returned to Ireland, where he engaged with ardour in the repeal agitation, and in 1847 was elected to Parliament for Nottingham. After the French revolution of 1848 he called another convention, and presented to the House of Commons a monster petition for the introduction of the national charter, which produced no effect. Disappointed in his hopes of reform both in England and Ireland, O'Connor fell into a state of hopeless lunacy, and in 1852 he was taken to an insane-asylum. Died in 1855.

See "Fraser's Magazine" for February, 1848.

O'Con'nor, (JAMES,) D.D., a bishop, born at Queenstown, Ireland, September 10, 1823, was educated in Philadelphia and at Rome, graduating in 1848, was a Roman Catholic priest and theological professor in Pittsburg and Philadelphia, 1857–76, and in 1876 was consecrated Bishop of Dibona and appointed Vicar-Apostolic of Omaha, Nebraska. Died in 1890.

O'Connor, (MICHAEL,) D.D., a bishop, born at Cork, in Ireland, September 27, 1810. He was educated at Rome, and in 1838 was placed in charge of a Roman Catholic seminary near Philadelphia. In 1843 he was consecrated Bishop of Pittsburg. He was appointed

* Cowley—following, it would seem, the French spelling—writes the name, in English, Ochozian. (See "Davideis," book ii., line 595.)

Bishop of Erie in 1853, but was translated to his former see in 1854. In 1860 he resigned his episcopal office and became a Jesuit. Died at Woodstock, Maryland, October 18, 1872.

O'Connor, (THOMAS POWER,) an Irish author, born at Athlone in 1848. He was educated at a Catholic college at Athlone, and graduated B.A. from the Queen's University. He followed journalism in Dublin and London, and in 1880 entered Parliament for Galway as a Home Ruler. His severely critical "Life of Lord Beaconsfield" has much literary merit.

O'Connor, (WILLIAM DOUGLAS,) an American novelist, born in Boston, January 2, 1832. He followed journalism in Boston and Philadelphia, and wrote "Harrington," (a romance, 1860,) "The Ghost," (1856,) and other stories and poems. In 1861 he entered the employ of the government and became assistant superintendent of the "Life-Saving Service." Died May 9, 1889.

O'Con'ọr, (CHARLES,) a distinguished American lawyer, the son of an Irish gentleman, was born in New York in 1804. He was admitted to the bar in 1826, and attained the highest professional rank. A zealous defender of purely Democratic politics, he never was a strictly party man. He was a Catholic in religion, and a gentleman of the noblest private character. Died at Nantucket, Massachusetts, May 12, 1884.

O'Conor, (CHARLES PATRIC,) an Irish poet, born about 1836, in the South of Ireland, of extremely destitute parents. Having removed to England, he became a lecturer and writer. Among his works are "Songs of a Life," "New Irish Melodies," "Songs for Soldiers," and some tales of Irish life.

O'Conor, (Sir NICHOLAS RODERICK,) a British diplomatist, born in Ireland in 1843. After long service in minor positions, he was minister at Peking 1892–95, ambassador at St. Petersburg 1895–98, and at Constantinople after 1898.

Oc-tā'vĭ-ą, [Fr. OCTAVIE, ok'tā've',] a Roman lady, born about 70 B.C., was a daughter of C. Octavius, and a sister of the emperor Augustus. She was married first to Marcellus, who died in 41. Soon after his death she became the wife of Mark Antony. This marriage was intended to confirm amicable relations between Antony and Augustus. By her beauty and virtue she obtained a favourable influence over Antony for a short time. She accompanied him in his expedition against the Parthians as far as Corcyra; but, supplanted in the affections of Antony by Cleopatra, she was sent back to Italy and divorced. Died in 11 B.C.

Octavia, a Roman empress, born in 42 A.D., was a daughter of the emperor Claudius and Messalina. She was married in 53 to Nero, who became emperor. He divorced her in 62 A.D., and a few months later put her to death.

Od-e-nā'tus or Od-e-nā'thus, [Fr. ODENATH, o'dẹh-nät',] Prince of Palmyra, the husband of Zenobia, was an able general. After the emperor Valerian had been defeated and captured by the Persians, (260 A.D.,) Odenatus raised an army, drove Sapor, the Persian king, from Syria, and assumed the title of King of Palmyra. He also invaded Persia, and pursued the King of Persia to Ctesiphon. For these services he received the title of Augustus from Gallienus, who recognized him as his colleague in 264. He was assassinated in 266 or 267 A.D. (See ZENOBIA.)

Odescalchi, (BENEDETTO.) See INNOCENT XI.

Odescalchi, o-dĕs-käl'kee, (MARCANTONIO,) an Italian nobleman, eminent for his philanthropy, was a cousin of Pope Innocent XI. He founded several institutions for the sick and the friendless, and at his death, in 1670, left all his property for their benefit.

Odescalchi, (TOMMASO,) a relative of the preceding, was almoner to Pope Innocent XI. In 1686 he founded an asylum for the education and employment of poor children. Died in 1692.

Odevaere, o-dĕh-vä′rĕh, (JOSEPHUS DIONYSIUS,) a celebrated Belgian painter, born at Bruges in 1778. Having studied under David in Paris, he visited Rome, where he executed two large frescos in the Quirinal palace, and the "Martyrdom of Saint Lawrence," now in a church of Bruges. He was appointed court painter to William I., King of the Netherlands, in 1815. Among his best works may be named the "Peace of Utrecht" and the "Battle of Nieuport." Died in 1830.

Od′gers, (WILLIAM BLAKE,) a British legal author, born at Plymouth in 1849. His works include "King Arthur and the Arthurian Romances," (1872,) "Odgers on Libel and Slander," (1881,) "Odgers on Pleading," (1891,) "An Outline of the Law of Libel," (1897.)

Odier, o′de-ā′, (LOUIS,) a distinguished physician, born at Genevā in 1748. He finished his studies at Edinburgh under Dr. Cullen, and, on his return, introduced vaccination into France and Switzerland. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, and filled several important offices in his native city. He was the author of a "Manual of Practical Medicine," and published, about 1798, in the "Bibliothèque Britannique," a translation of one of Jenner's treatises on vaccination. Died in 1817.

Odilo (o′de′lo′) or Odilon de Mercœur, o′de′lôN′ dĕh mĕR′kUR′, SAINT, a French monk, born in 962, was eminent for learning. He was elected Abbot of Cluny, which, under his direction, became one of the most celebrated monasteries of Europe. Died in 1048 or 1049.

O′din or Ōðinn, (ō′thin,) written also Othin, [called by the Germans WO′DAN or WO′DEN; Old German, WUOTAN, derived from vaða, to "wade," to "go," to "pervade,"] in the Norse mythology, the greatest of all the gods, corresponding in the main to the Zeus or Jupiter of the Greeks and Romans. His name is supposed to signify "mind" or "spirit." As the father of the Æsir, (the ruling gods of heaven and earth,) he is styled All-father, (Al-foðr or Al-faðir,) although he himself was the son of Bör,* and the grandson of Buri.† He is also called Val-father, (Val-föðr, i.e. "father of the fallen,") because all who fell in battle were supposed to belong in an especial manner to him. Hence his hall is called Valhalla, (or Valhöll,) the "hall of the fallen" or "slain." Valhalla is situated in Odin's mansion, called Gladheim or Gladsheim, (the "home or habitation of gladness.") The roof of the hall is formed of spears and shields. The hall itself is surrounded by a roaring river called Thund, and has five hundred and forty gates, through each of which eight hundred men can go abreast. Here are assembled all the chosen warriors (Einheriar) who have fallen in battle; it is their pastime to fight and slay each other every day, but the wounded are quickly healed, and the dead are restored to life. They then ride back to Valhalla, where they refresh themselves by drinking mead (or beer) with the gods and feasting on the flesh of the boar Sæhrimnir. The Valkyries (Valkyrjur or Valkyriur) wait upon the warriors, furnishing them with drink and food, (see VALKYRIA;) but Odin himself lives on wine alone. Near Valhalla is Vingolf, the hall where the goddesses assemble. Odin's throne was called Hlidskjalf (hlid′ske-älf′) or Lidskialf, whence his eye is said to survey the whole world.

Regarding Odin as the living spirit which pervades the universe, the Norse poets have represented living nature under the symbol of the ash-tree, (Ygg′drasil or Ig′drasil,) that is, the seat or abode of Odin.‡ "All life," says Carlyle, "is figured by them [the Northmen] as a tree. Igdrasil, the Ash-tree of Existence, has its roots deep down in the kingdom of Hela, (or Death,) its trunk reaches up heaven-high, spreads its boughs over the whole universe. . . . At the foot of it, in the Death-kingdom, sit Three Nornas, Fates,—the Past, Present, Future,—watering its roots from the sacred Well. . . . Its boughs are histories of nations. The rustle of it is the noise of human existence. . . . I find no similitude so true as this of a tree. Beautiful; altogether beautiful and great. The 'machine of the universe,'—alas, do but think of that in contrast!"

Although Odin (Spirit or Thought) was the principal creator of the heavens and the earth, he was assisted by his brothers Vili (Will) and Ve, (Holiness.) "The gods, having got the giant Ymir slain," says Carlyle, "determined on constructing a world with him. His blood made the sea, his flesh was the land, and the rocks his bones; of his eyebrows they formed Asgard, . . . his skull was the great blue vault of immensity, and the brains of it became the clouds. What a Hyper-Brobdignagian business!" It is, however, only in the creation of the world that Vili and Ve are mentioned; they appear afterwards to have become blended or absorbed in Odin, the all-embracing World-Spirit. Among Odin's possessions may be mentioned a horse of wondrous powers, with eight legs, called Sleipnir, on which he rides over land and sea; and Gungnir, (gŭng′nir,) a spear, which never failed to strike whatever it was aimed at. He has also two ravens, named Hugin and Munin, which he sends forth over the whole world to get intelligence. In addition to his other attributes, Odin was supposed to possess marvellous powers as a magician.

Odin is to be considered to represent energy and courage rather than knowledge. Hence it is said that he once went to Mimir's§ well, at the root of Yggdrasil, for a drink from the fountain of knowledge, but, in order to obtain it, it was necessary for him to deposit one of his eyes as a pledge, whence he is usually represented as one-eyed.

War being almost the sole occupation of the ancient Northmen, Odin, their principal deity, became of necessity the god of war, his character in this respect nearly corresponding to that of the Mars (Ares) of classic mythology.‖ He is represented as having first introduced war and slaughter among mankind. Again, he differed from Jupiter in not wielding the thunderbolt, this weapon belonging to Thor; but, in a region where thunderstorms are comparatively unfrequent, the possession of the thunderbolt was less essential to the dignity of the chief of the gods than in the countries where Olympian Zeus was worshipped. (See THOR.)

Odin is not immortal in the fullest sense; at Ragnaröck (the final destruction of the Æsir and the world) he is fated to be destroyed by the wolf Fenrir, the offspring of Loki. (See LOKI.)

† BURI, (boo′re,) written also BURE, [i.e. "producing," because, being the first of the gods, he was the progenitor of all the others,] is described as a mighty and beautiful being in human form, who came into existence soon after the mythic cow Audhumla began to lick the frost-covered rocks of the primeval chaos. He had a son named Bör (bör) or Bore, [i.e. "born" or "produced," and hence "son,"] who is said to have married the daughter of the giant Bolthorn, and to have had by her three sons,—Odin, Vili, and Ve.

‡ YGG or YGGR (i.e. the "terrible") is one of the many names of Odin. Drasill or drôsull is said to signify "chariot" or "seat."

§ Mimir signifies the "knowing one."

Od-o-ā'cer, [Gr. 'Οδόακρος; Fr. ODOACRE, o'do'ăkR',] a Gothic military commander in the service of the Western Roman empire. Soon after the deposition of the emperor Julius Nepos by Orestes, who had usurped the throne in the name of his son Romulus, Odoacer advanced to Pavía, took Orestes prisoner, and caused him to be executed, in 475 A.D. Having banished Romulus, he was proclaimed King of Italy by his army; but he refused the imperial titles, and the Western Empire was thenceforth considered at an end. In 488, Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, invaded Italy, and besieged Odoacer in Ravenna. After a brave and protracted resistance, he was compelled to surrender, and was executed in 493, by order of Theodoric, who proclaimed himself king.

O'Don'nell, (LEOPOLD,) Count of Lucena and Duke of Tetuan, a Spanish general, of Irish extraction, was born in 1808 or 1809. He fought for the queen against the Carlists in the civil war which began about 1833, and defeated Cabrera at Lucena in 1839. He became the enemy of Espartero, whom he drove from power in 1843. In 1854 he instigated a revolt which resulted in a change of the ministry, and he was appointed minister of war. He was prime minister from July to October, 1856, and was restored to the same office in June, 1858. He commanded with success in a war against Morocco in 1859–60. He died in exile at Biarritz in 1867.

O'Don'nell or O'Don'el, (RODERICK,) was created Earl of Tyrconnel by James I. in 1603. Several of his descendants espoused the cause of James II., and, after his defeat at the battle of the Boyne, settled in Austria, where they rose to distinction in the State and the army. CHARLES O'DONNELL served in the Seven Years' war, and became field-marshal lieutenant, and in 1768 was made Governor-General of Transylvania. Died in 1770. MAURICE O'DONNELL married Christine, daughter of the Prince of Ligne, and rose to be chamberlain and field-marshal lieutenant. Died in 1843. JOSEPH HENRY O'DONNELL entered the Spanish service about 1795, and gained several advantages over the French. For his victory at L'Abispal he received the title of Count of Abispal. Having subsequently incurred the suspicions of the constitutional party, he was deprived of his command, and took refuge in France, where he died in 1834.

OEKOLAMPAD, ö-ko-lâm-pât',] an eminent German Reformer, whose original name was HAUSSCHEIN or HUSGEN, was born in Franconia in 1482. He studied theology at Heidelberg, and became in 1515 pastor of a church at Bâle, in Switzerland, where he strongly denounced the abuses of the Roman Church. About 1522 he openly declared in favour of the Reformed faith, and in 1524 was appointed professor of divinity at Bâle. In the controversy between Luther and Zuinglius concerning the real presence, he adopted the views of the latter. He was the author of numerous theological works, among which may be named his Commentaries on Isaiah, Job, Daniel, and Jeremiah, a treatise "On the Passover," ("De Ritu Paschali,") and "Annotations on Genesis." He was one of the most profound scholars of his time, and was remarkable for the moderation and general excellence of his character. Died in 1531.

The 9th and last volume was issued in 1814. Oeder also wrote several able treatises on political economy and finance. Died in 1791.

Œdipe. See ŒDIPUS.

Œdipus, ĕd'ę-pus, [Gr. Οἰδίπους; Fr. ŒDIPE, à'dèp',] a son of Laius, King of Thebes, and Jocasta, was celebrated in Greek mythology and tragic poetry as a type or instance of the fatality which man cannot escape. According to the legend, an oracle warned Laius that if he ever had a son, that son should kill his father and marry his mother. Laius therefore exposed his first-born son soon after his birth, in order that he might perish; but he was found by a shepherd of Polybus, King of Corinth, was named Œdipus, and brought up as the son of Polybus. Having consulted the oracle of Delphi, he was informed that he should commit parricide. In the course of a journey he met Laius in the road, with attendants, who provoked a quarrel, in which Œdipus killed the King of Thebes. Soon after this event the throne of Thebes and the hand of Jocasta, the queen, were offered to him who should solve the riddle of the Sphinx. (See SPHINX.) Œdipus solved the riddle, obtained the throne, and became father of several children by Jocasta. He afterwards discovered his guilt, and suffered penalties and misfortunes of which contradictory accounts are given by different writers.

Ægir, [from oga, to "shudder at," to "dread,"] or Hler, hlair, i.e. the "Shelterer," [from hlé, "lee,"] the god of the sea or ocean. His wife Ran has a net, with which, it is said, she catches seafarers. Their numerous daughters are the waves of the ocean. Ægir and Hler appear to have been originally regarded as two distinct personages,—the former ruling over the stormy, the latter over the tranquil, sea. Ran (signifying "robbery," or "one who robs or bereaves") represents the tendency of the sea to rob men of life and of their most precious treasures. It is related in one of the Norse legends that, the Æsir having once paid a visit to Ægir, he was in want of a kettle large enough to brew beer for them. Thereupon Thor and Tyr went to the dwelling of the giant Hymir, who had a very spacious kettle, a mile deep. Thor grasped the kettle by the rim and threw it over his head, so that the rings came down to his feet, almost hiding him from view. After that, Ægir and the Æsir had an ample supply of beer for their banquets.

Oehlenschläger or Öhlenschläger, ö'lęn-shlā'gęr, (ADAM GOTTLOB,) an eminent Danish poet, born in a suburb of Copenhagen on the 14th of November, 1779, was the son of a German who had settled in Denmark. He began at an early age to write plays, which he would act in company with his sister and young associates. His enthusiasm for the drama introduced him to the notice and friendship of Rahbek and Rosing. He was afterwards attracted to the study of Scandinavian antiquities and historical legends, which furnished material for some of his most popular dramas. He published in 1805 a collection of poems, including the dramatic tale of "Aladdin," which displays the splendid colouring of Oriental fiction. The same year he visited Germany, where he acquired the friendship of Goethe, Tieck, and other celebrated writers of the time. While there he composed several dramas in Danish, which he translated into German and submitted to the criticism of his friends. From Germany he proceeded to Paris, and thence to Rome, returning to Copenhagen in 1810. He had written during his absence his tragedies of "Palnatoke," (1809,) "Axel and Valborg," (1810,) and "Correggio," which are ranked among his best productions. He was appointed soon after his return professor of æsthetics in the University of Copenhagen, and the same year married Christiana Heger, a sister of Rahbek's wife. Among the most important of his other works are the dramas of "Hakon Jarl," "Stærkodder," "Hagbarth and Signa," (1814.) "The Normans at Byzantium," "Charlemagne," "Tordenskiold," and "Amleth," also the poems entitled "Helge," (1814,) "Hroar's Saga," (1817,) and his splendid epic, "The Gods of the North," ("Nordens Guder," 1819.) He died in January, 1850, and his funeral was solemnized with great magnificence by his countrymen, by whom he is generally regarded as the great national poet of Denmark. "Few men," says M. Marmier, "have been endowed with a genius as fertile and as facile as that of Oehlenschläger. The verses fall from his pen like water from a fountain. Hence his style is charming in its grace, flexibility, and abandon, but it is frequently very negligent."

Œnée. See ŒNEUS.

Œneus, ee'nūs, [Gr. Οἰνεύς; Fr. ŒNÉE, à'nà',] a king of Calydon, married Althæa, and was the father of Meleager, Tydeus, and other children. According to the fable, he offended Diana, who sent a wild boar to ravage his dominions. This boar was the object of the famous Calydonian hunt. Œneus is said to have been the first whom Bacchus taught to cultivate the vine.

Œnomas. See ŒNOMAUS.

Œnomaus, e-no'ma-us, [Gr. Οἰνόμαος; Fr. ŒNOMAS, à'no'màs',] a king of Pisa, in Elis, was called a son of Mars. The poets feigned that he promised to give his daughter Hippodami'a to the man who should conquer him in a chariot-race, with the annexed condition that every one who tried and failed must suffer death. After many suitors had failed and perished, Pelops gained the victory, and Œnomaus killed himself.

Œnomaus, [Οἰνόμαος,] a Greek philosopher of the Cynic school, born at Gadara, lived about 120–40 A.D. He wrote, besides other works, a treatise in which he exposed the impostures of Oracles. His works are not extant.

Œnone, ē-no'ne, [Gr. Οἰνώνη; Fr. OENONE, à'non',] a nymph of Mount Ida, who was said to have received from Apollo the gift of prophecy, and to have been married to Paris before he was known to be a son of Priam.

Œnopides, ē-nop'e-dèz, [Οἰνοπίδης,] a Greek astronomer, born at Chios, lived in the fifth century B.C. He is said to have derived his knowledge from the Egyptian priests. Ælian attributes to him the invention of the cycle of fifty-nine years to make the lunar year coincide or accord with the solar year. He was acquainted with the obliquity of the ecliptic.

Œnopion, ē-no'pe-on, [Gr. Οἰνοπίων; Fr. OENOPE, à'nop', or OENOPION, à'no'pe'ôn',] in classic mythology, a son of Bacchus, and King of Chios, (Scio.) His daughter Merope, it is said, was ravished by Orion. (See ORION.)

Oernhielm or Örnhielm, örn'he-êlm', (CLAUDIUS ARRHENIUS,) a Swedish historian, born at Linkoping in 1627. He wrote, besides other works, "On the Monarchies of the World," ("De Monarchiis Orbis," 1683.) Died in 1695.

Oersted or Örsted, ör'stĕd, (ANDERS SANDÖE,) an eminent Danish jurist and statesman, born at Rudkiöbing in 1778. He married Sophia, a sister of the famous poet Oehlenschläger, in 1802. He published numerous legal works, one of which is entitled "Eunomia," (4 vols., 1815–22.) In 1841 or 1842 he became a minister of state, and opposed the liberal or popular measures. He resigned in 1848, and was appointed prime minister in 1853. His policy having been condemned by the Diet, he was removed about the end of 1854. He published a "History of my Life and Times," (4 vols., 1851–56.) Died in 1860.

See ERSLEW, "Forfatter-Lexicon."

Oersted, (ANDERS SANDÖE,) a naturalist, a nephew of the preceding, was born at Rudkjöbing in 1816. He travelled in the West Indies, and published several works on natural history. Died September 3, 1872.

Oersted, (HANS CHRISTIAN,) a celebrated Danish natural philosopher, the founder of the science of electro-magnetism, was born at Rudkjöbing, in the island of Langeland, on the 14th of August, 1777. He was educated with his brother, Anders Sandöe, the jurist, at the University of Copenhagen. In 1806 he obtained the chair of physics in that institution. He produced in 1812 an "Essay on the Identity of Chemical and Electrical Forces." In 1820 he announced his great discovery of the relation between magnetism and electricity, in a short work entitled "Experimenta circum Effectum Conflictus electrici in Acum magneticum." The electric telegraph is one of the most direct practical results of this discovery. He demonstrated that the electric current, according to a uniform law, "exercises determined and similar impressions on the direction of a magnetic needle" near which it passes. This discovery was received with great enthusiasm, as the revelation of an important fact which had long escaped the researches of so many sagacious minds. "Of all the philosophers who had speculated on this subject," says Sir John Herschel, "none had so pertinaciously adhered to the idea of a necessary connection between the phenomena as Oersted. Baffled often, he returned to the attack, and his perseverance was at length rewarded by the complete disclosure of the wonderful phenomena of electro-magnetism." ("Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.")

"The desideratum of a clear expression of the manifest alliance between electricity and magnetism," says James David Forbes, "had been so long and so universally felt that the discovery placed its author in the first rank of scientific men. There was not even, so far as I am aware, a suspicion that he had been, however remotely or dimly, anticipated. The prize of the French Institute, which had been awarded to Davy for his galvanic discoveries, was bestowed upon Oersted." (Sixth Dissertation of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," vol. i.) "I scarcely know," says Niebuhr, "another natural philosopher with so much intellect and freedom from prejudice and esprit de corps." Oersted received for this discovery the Copley medal of the Royal Society of London, and was created a knight of the order of Danebrog. He also made discoveries in chemistry, and wrote a number of works on that science. Among these are "Materialien zu einer Chemie des 19ten Jahrhunderts," (1803,) and "Tentamen Nomenclaturæ chemicæ," (1814.) He wrote a poem called "The Balloon," ("Luftskibet," 1836.) His writings have contributed greatly to popularize science. A selection of his works was published in 1850, under the title of "The Spirit in Nature," ("Der Geist in der Natur,") preceded by a biographical notice of Oersted by P. L. Möller. Died in March, 1851.

Oeser or Öser, (JOHANN LUDWIG,) a landscape-painter and engraver, born at Dresden in 1751, was a son of the preceding. Died in 1792.

Oesterley or Osterley, ös'tęr-li', (KARL W.,) a German painter of history and portraits, born at Göttingen in 1805; became court painter at Hanover. Died in 1891

Oetinger, ö'ting'ęr, sometimes written Ottinger, (FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH,) a learned German theologian, and prominent leader of the Pietists, was born in Würtemberg in 1702. He wrote a number of commentaries on the Scriptures, a treatise entitled "The Age of Gold," and "Ancient Philosophy." He also translated several of the works of Swedenborg, of whom he was a warm admirer, and whom he much resembled in purity of character and religious fervour. He was a friend of Count Zinzendorf, whom he assisted in a new translation of the Scriptures. Died in 1782.

Oetter or Ötter, öt'tęr, (SAMUEL WILHELM,) a German antiquary, born at Goldcronach in 1720. He wrote on history and antiquities. Died in 1792.

Oettinger or Öttinger, öt'ting'ęr, (EDUARD MARIE,) a German journalist and novelist, born at Breslau in 1808. He edited several satirical journals, and published a number of novels, among which is "Onkel Zebra," (7 vols., 1843.) He also wrote a work entitled "Rossini," (1847,) which is said to be a romance rather than a biography, and "Bibliographie biographique universelle," (2 vols., 1850–54,) the most complete work on that subject. Died June 26, 1872.

Ofalia, o-fä'le-ä, (DON NARCISO DE HEREDIA,) COUNT, a Spanish statesman, born in 1771, became minister of the interior under Zea Bermudez in 1832. He was appointed by Ferdinand VII. executor of his will and a member of the council of regency. He was president of the council of ministers in 1837. Died in 1843.

O'Färrill, (DON GONZALO,) a Spanish general, born at Havana in 1754, became minister of war under Joseph Bonaparte. Died in Paris in 1831.

Of'fa, a Saxon, who succeeded Ethelbald as King of Mercia in 755 A.D. Having murdered Ethelbert, King of East Anglia, he took possession of his kingdom.

Offenbach, of'fęn-bȧk', (JACQUES,) a popular composer of comic operas, born at Cologne in 1819, studied in Paris. Among his works are the "Grand Duchess of Gerolstein," "Orpheus in the Lower Regions," "La Belle Hélène," "Blue-Beard," "La Vie Parisienne," "La Bavarde de Saragosse," "La Périchole," "Les Brigands," "Le Corsaire Noir," "La Jolie Parfumeuse," "Voyage dans la Lune," and "Le Docteur Ox." Died October 5, 1880.

Of'for, (GEORGE,) an English writer, and a bookseller in London, was born about 1786. He published a "Life of John Bunyan," (1853.) Died in 1864.

O'Fihely, o-fee'le, ? (MAURICE,) an Irish prelate and scholar, who was made Archbishop of Tuam by Pope Julius II. in 1506. He was eminent for his learning, and was surnamed FLOS MUNDI, ("Flower of the World.") Died in 1513.

O-fil'i-us, (AULUS,) a Roman jurist of high reputation, was a friend of Cicero, and a pupil of Sulpicius. His writings are cited in the Digest. Among his pupils were Capito and Labeo.

O'Flaherty, o-flä'hęr-te, (RODERIC,) born at Moycullin, Ireland, in 1630, published in 1685 a Latin "History of Ireland from the Deluge to the Year 1684." Died in 1718.

O'Flan'a-gan, (JAMES RODERICK,) an Irish author, born at Fermoy, September 1, 1814. He was called to the bar in 1838. He published "Impressions at Home and Abroad," (2 vols., 1837,) "Bar Life of O'Connell," (1866,) "Bryan O'Regan," (a novel, 1866,) "Lives of the Lord Chancellors of Ireland," (2 vols., 1870,) "Captain O'Shaughnessy's Sporting Career," (1873,) "The Irish Bar," (1879,) "History of the Irish People," and other works.

Ofterdingen, von, fon of'ter-ding'en, (HEINRICH,) a famous German minstrel or minnesinger of the thirteenth century, was a favourite of Leopold, Duke of Austria. He is supposed by some writers to have been the author of the "Nibelungenlied;" but of this there appears to be little evidence.

Oggione, d', dōd-jo'nā, (MARCO,) written also Uggione, an eminent Italian painter, born in the Milanese about 1470, was a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, whose style he imitated successfully. Among his master-pieces are his "Three Archangels," and an altar-piece at Milan. His most important works are two copies of "The Last Supper" of Da Vinci, one of which is in the Academy of Arts in London. The excellence of these pictures, and the destruction by time of the original, have caused them to be greatly prized. Died in 1530.

Ogier. See HOLGER THE DANE.

Ogier, o'zhe-ā', (CHARLES,) a French scholar, born in Paris in 1595. He published notes of his travels in Denmark, Sweden, etc., "Ephemerides, sive Iter Danicum, Suecicum et Polonicum," (1656.) Died in 1654.

Ogier, (FRANÇOIS,) a French writer and ecclesiastic, was a brother of the preceding. He published an "Apology for M. de Balzac," (1627,) and other works. Died in 1670.

O'gil-by or Ogleby, o'gel-be, (JOHN,) a Scottish littérateur and printer, born at Edinburgh in 1600, was noted for the variety and versatility of his talents. In 1633 he accompanied Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, to Ireland, in the capacity of dancing-master and copyist. After his return to England he published, in 1650, a poetical translation of Virgil, and, in conjunction with James Shirley, afterwards translated the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" into English verse, having learned Greek for that purpose when upwards of fifty years of age. These versions were very popular at that time, and possessed great typographical beauty. Ogilby was also appointed royal cosmographer, and published a number of geographical works. Died in 1676.

Ogilvie, o'gil-ve, (JAMES,) a Scottish orator and teacher of elocution, born about 1760, or, as others say, 1775. He delivered lectures as models of oratory in the chief cities of the United States, and received much applause. He died at Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1820.

Ogilvie, (JOHN,) a Scottish divine and writer, born in 1733. Among his works are "Britannia," an epic poem, (1801,) and an "Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy in Favour of Christianity," (1803.) Died in 1814.

Ogilvie, (JOHN,) LL.D., a Scottish lexicographer, born in 1797. He prepared the "Imperial Dictionary." Died November 21, 1867.

Oginski, o-gēn'skee, (MICHAEL CASIMIR,) a Polish nobleman, born at Warsaw in 1731. He constructed a canal in Poland. Died in 1803.

Oginski, (MICHAEL CLEOPHAS,) a Polish composer, born at Warsaw in 1765, was a nephew of the preceding. He settled in Italy about 1815, and gained distinction as a musical composer. He wrote "Memoirs of Poland from 1788 to 1815," (2 vols., 1826.) Died in 1831.

Ogleby. See OGILBY.

Oglesby, o'gels-be, (RICHARD J.,) an American general, born in Kentucky in 1824. He removed to Illinois, and practised law in that State. He commanded a brigade at Fort Donelson, February, 1861, and was severely wounded at the battle of Corinth, October 4, 1862. He was elected Governor of Illinois for four years, (1865–68,) and again in 1872. In 1873 he was sent to the United States Senate. Died in 1899.

Oglethorpe, o'gel-thorp, (JAMES EDWARD,) an English general, born in London, June 1, 1689. He served for a time under Marlborough and Prince Eugene in Germany, and obtained in 1733 the royal charter for founding a colony in North America, which he called Georgia in honour of the reigning king. Having passed several years in Georgia, he returned to England in 1743, and commanded an army against the Pretender in 1745. He was a member of Parliament for many years. Died in 1785. The virtues and talents of General Oglethorpe have been celebrated by Pope, Thomson, and Dr. Johnson.

O'Gor'man, (JAMES,) D.D., a bishop, born in Ireland in 1814. In 1859 he was consecrated Roman Catholic Bishop of Rhaphanea and made Vicar-Apostolic of Nebraska. Died at Omaha, July 4, 1874.

O'Gra'dy, (STANDISH,) an Irish author, was born in 1847, son of Viscount Guillamore. He wrote "History of Ireland," (1878–80,) "Bardic Literature," (1879,) "Lost on Du Corrig," (1894,) etc.

Og'y-gēs or Og'y-gus [Gr. Ὠγύγης, Ὤγυγος, or Ωγυγής; Fr. OGYGÈS, o'zhe'zhès'] is said to have been the first king or ruler of Thebes, which was sometimes called Ogygia. According to some writers, he was also King of Attica, and the father of Eleusis. In his reign occurred a great inundation of Greece or Bœotia, which is called the Ogygian deluge and is supposed to have been anterior to that of Deucalion.

Ogygus. See OGYGES.

O'Hal'lo-ran, (SYLVESTER,) an Irish antiquary and surgeon, born in 1728. He became surgeon of the Limerick Hospital. He published an "Introduction to the Study of the History and Antiquities of Ireland," (1772,) and a "General History of Ireland," (2 vols., 1772.) Died in 1807.

O'Hara, o-hā'ra, (JAMES,) a native of Ireland, emigrated in 1772 to America, where he became quartermaster-general under General Wayne. He was one of the founders of Pittsburg. Died in 1819.

O'Hara, (KANE,) a popular Irish dramatist, wrote, among other plays, "The Golden Pippin," "The Two Misers," and "Midas." Died in 1782.

O'Hara, o-hā'ra, (THEODORE,) an American poet born in Kentucky about 1820. He served in the Mexican war, and was (1861–65) in the Confederate army, acting at first as colonel of Alabama troops, and then as chief of staff to General Breckinridge. Died in Alabama in 1867. He is best known for his poem "The Bivouac of the Dead."

Ohlenschläger. See OEHLENSCHLÄGER.

Öhlmüller, ö'l'mŭl'ler, (JOSEPH DANIEL,) an eminent German architect, born at Bamberg in 1791. Among his best works are the national monument at Upper Wittelsbach, the chapel at Kiefersfelden, and the Gothic church near Munich. The last-named structure is esteemed one of the most magnificent specimens of its style erected in modern times. Died in 1839.

Ohm, ōm, (GEORG SIMON,) a German natural philosopher, born at Erlangen in 1787. He became professor of mathematics in the Jesuits' College of Cologne in 1817. He gained distinction by the discovery of the laws of electric currents, on which he published in 1827 a work called "Die galvanische Kette mathematische bearbeitet." He received the Copley medal of the Royal Society of London in 1841. Died at Munich in 1854.

Ohmacht, o'mâkt, (LANDOLIN,) a German sculptor, born near Rotweil in 1760, was a friend of the poet Klopstock, and of Lavater. Among his best works are the "Judgment of Paris," a "Neptune," a "Flora," a monument to General Kléber, and a bust of Klopstock. Died in 1834.

Ohnet, (GEORGES,) a popular French novelist, was born in 1848. His series of novels, some of which have reached the hundredth edition, have the general title of "Les Batailles de la Vie." Some of them are "Le Maître de Forges," (1882,) "La Grande Marnière," (1885,) "Nimrod et Cie," (1893,) and "La Femme en Gris," (1895.)

Ohsson, ō'son, (CONSTANTINE,) BARON OF, born at Constantinople about 1780, was the son of Mouradja d'Ohsson, an Armenian, (see MOURADJA D'OHSSON.) He wrote a "History of the Mongols," (1835,) and a "History of the Caucasians in the Tenth Century." He also finished his father's "Picture of the Ottoman Empire." Died at Berlin in 1851.

Oiconomos or Œconomos, e-kon'o-mos, (CONSTANTIN,) a learned Greek priest and writer, born in Thessaly in 1780. He taught Greek at Smyrna for ten years, and afterwards preached at Saint Petersburg and at Athens. He wrote several works on language, and "De la Version des Septante," (4 vols., 1843–50.) Died in 1857.

Oisel, oi'zęl, [Lat. OISE'LIUS,] (JAKOB,) written also Ouzel, ŏw'zęl, a Dutch critic and jurist, born at Dantzic in 1631. He became professor of public law at Groningen in 1667. He edited Aulus Gellius, and published a work on numismatics, called "Thesaurus selectorum Numismatum antiquorum," (2 vols., 1677.) Died in 1686.

Oiselius. See OISEL.

Oi'sin, a noted Irish poet, who probably lived in the last part of the third or the beginning of the fourth century A.D. He was son of Finn, a famous hero, and probably was the original of Ossian, the son of Fingal. (See OSSIAN.) Two poems ascribed to Oisin are still extant.

Ojeda, de, dā o-hā'dā, (ALONZO,) a Spanish explorer and lieutenant of Columbus, was born at Cuenca about 1465 or 1470. He accompanied Columbus in his second voyage to America in 1493, and commanded an expedition which Columbus sent to explore the interior of Hispaniola, where he captured the chief Caonabo. Having returned to Spain, he obtained command of an exploring expedition sent out in 1499. Among his officers or passengers was Amerigo Vespucci. He discovered a part of the new continent, which he named Venezuela, and returned to Spain in 1500. In 1508 he attempted to colonize New Andalusia, and to conquer the natives, but was not successful.

O'Keefe, o-keef', (JOHN,) an Irish dramatist, born at Dublin in 1747. The number of his plays amounted to upwards of sixty, and, though their merits are not of a high order, they enjoyed great popularity. Among the most admired we may name "The Agreeable Surprise" and "Wild Oats." Died in 1833.

See "Recollections of the Life of John O'Keefe," by himself, 1826.

Okeghem, o'kęh-hĕm, written also Ockenhein, (JAN,) an eminent Flemish musician and composer, born in Hainault about 1430; died after 1500.

Oken, o'kęn, or Ockenfuss, ok'kęn-fōōss', (LORENZ,) an eminent German naturalist of the transcendental school, was born at Bohlsbach, in Würtemberg, in August, 1779. He abridged the original name of his family, OCKENFUSS, into OKEN. He studied at Göttingen, and became a privat-docent in that university. In a remarkable work, entitled "Elements of Natural Philosophy, the Theory of the Senses, and the Classification of Animals," ("Grundriss der Naturphilosophie," etc., 1802,) he gave the outlines of a scheme that he afterwards devoted himself to perfect, and advanced the idea that "the animal classes are virtually nothing else than a representation of the organs of sense." He accordingly divided the animal kingdom into five classes. He was an advocate of the theory of development in its largest sense. Among his doctrines, as quoted by Professor Hitchcock, are the following: "Plants and animals can only be metamorphoses of infusoria. No organism has been created of larger size than an infusorial point; whatever is larger has not been created, but developed. . . . The mind, just as the body, must be developed out of these animals, [infusoria.] . . . Everything that is, is material." ("The Religion of Geology," p. 299.) He produced in 1805 a treatise on Generation, in which he maintained that "all organic beings originate from and consist of cells or vesicles." In 1807 he was appointed extraordinary professor of medical sciences in the University of Jena, where he gained a high reputation by his lectures on zoology, physiology, etc. He developed his peculiar system of natural science in his "Manual of Natural Philosophy," (1809.) From 1816 to 1848 he was editor of the "Isis," a journal of natural history. In 1832 he obtained a professorship at Zurich, where he died in 1851. Olbers, ol'bẹrs, (HEINRICH WILHELM MATHIAS,) an eminent German astronomer and physician, born at Arbergen, near Bremen, in October, 1758. He studied medicine at Göttingen, and practised at Bremen, where he constructed a private observatory. He gained distinction by his observations on the comet of 1779, and discovered an improved method of calculating the orbits of comets. He published about 1797 a treatise on this method, which is considered a very important contribution to astronomy. In March, 1802, Olbers discovered a new asteroid, which he named Pallas, the orbit of which is nearly as distant from the sun as that of Ceres. He adopted the hypothesis that Ceres and Pallas were fragments of a large planet which had been broken by an internal convulsion, and predicted that other asteroids would be found. In 1804 Harding discovered Juno, and in March, 1807, Olbers discovered the fourth asteroid, which he named Vesta. The mean distance of their orbits from the sun is nearly the same as that of the orbits of Ceres and Pallas. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London in 1804. In 1815 he discovered a comet which is called by his name, and which performs a revolution in about seventy-four years. He died at Bremen in 1840.

Died in 1884.

Ollivier, (ÉMILE,) a French advocate and orator, born at Marseilles in 1825. He practised law with success in Paris, and was elected to the legislative body by the voters of that city in 1857. He was re-elected in 1863. He acted with the Liberal party for many years, but became in 1869 an adherent of Napoleon, who in December of that year appointed him prime minister, and requested him "to name persons who will, associated with yourself, form a homogeneous cabinet, faithfully representing the legislative majority." He took the position of minister of justice in the new cabinet formed (January 2, 1870) partly of the leaders of the Left Centre and partly of those of the Right Centre. The formation of this coalition ministry was regarded as an important event, and as the beginning of a constitutional régime. The Corps Législatif, after an excited debate, adopted a resolution of confidence in the minister, April 5, 1870, by a vote of 227 to 43. The most liberal members of the cabinet resigned about the 1st of May, 1870; but the policy of Napoleon and Ollivier was approved by a majority of the popular votes, May 8. Ollivier was elected to the French Academy in April, 1870. He resigned the office of prime minister, August 9, 1870. He subsequently withdrew to Italy, where he wrote "Lamartine," (1874,) "Thiers," (1879,) and other works, including "L'Empire Libéral," a defence of his policy, (7 vols., 1894, et seq.)

Omalius d'Halloy, d', do'mă'le'üs' dă'lwă', (JEAN BAPTISTE JULIEN,) a Belgian geologist, born at Liege in 1783, published several works on geology. Died in 1875.

O'man, (CHARLES WILLIAM,) a British historian, born at Mozufferpoor, India, in 1860. Among his works are "History of Greece," (1888,) "Warwick, the King Maker," (1891,) "History of Europe, 476–918," (1893,) "History of the Art of War in the Middle Ages," (1898,) etc.

O'mar (or O'mer) I., written also Oomur or Umar, o͝o'mar, (Aboo-Hafsah-Ibn-ool-Khatâb or Abu-Hafsah-Ibnul-Khattab, ă'bo͝o hăf'sah ĭb'no͝ol kăt-tâb',) the second caliph or successor of Mohammed the Prophet, was a cousin in the third degree to Abdallah, the father of that legislator. After he had attempted to kill Mohammed, Omar was converted to Islamism, about 615 A.D. He succeeded Aboo-Bekr in the year 634. His army took Damascus in 635, defeated the Greeks at Yarmook or Yermuk, and besieged Jerusalem. This city in 637 or 638 was surrendered to Omar, who treated the Christians with great lenity. On the site of Solomon's temple he built the magnificent mosque which bears his name. About 638 he completed the conquest of Syria and of Persia, (see YEZDEJERD,) and founded the city of Koofah. Amroo, one of Omar's generals, subdued Egypt in 640 or 641, and consumed by fire the great library at Alexandria, after the caliph had decided, as we are told, that "if the books accord with the Koran, they are unnecessary; and if they are contrary to the Koran, they are pernicious, and should be destroyed." He was assassinated by a Persian slave, Firooz, in his capital, Medina, in 644 A.D., at the age of sixty-three, and was succeeeded by Othmân. Omar is praised for wisdom, justice, and moderation, and is said to have contributed more to the progress of his religion than Mohammed himself. His name is greatly venerated by the orthodox sect of Moslems, called Sunnites.

Omar (or Omer) II., the eighth caliph of the Omeyyade dynasty, was the son of Abd-el-Azeez, (Abdelaziz,) and the nephew of Abd-el-Malek. He was also a great-grandson of Omar I., whom he resembled in his virtues. He succeeded his cousin Solyman in 717 A.D. He suppressed the maledictions which in former reigns were pronounced in the mosques against the descendants of Alee. The princes of his own race, fearing that he should bequeath the empire to one of the race of Alee, poisoned him in 720 A.D.

Omar, a Moorish physician, born at Córdova in 990 A.D., was celebrated for his skill in surgery, and was also a profound mathematician. Died in 1080.

Omar, an eminent physician, astronomer, and mathematician, supposed to have been a native of Hadramaut, in Arabia. He settled in Spain, where he died in 1071.

Omar, (Al-Mutawakkel-Billah, ăl mōō-tă-wăk'kel bĭl'lah,) the last king of Badajoz of the Benî-al-Aftas, began his reign in 1082 A.D. In conjunction with his ally, Yoosuf, King of Morocco, he gained a signal victory over the Christian army at Zalaca in 1086 A.D. Yoosuf soon after made war upon Omar, took him prisoner, and had him put to death about 1090, after having promised to spare his life.

Omar-Ibn-Hafsoon, (or -Hafssûn,) o'mar ĭb'n hăf'sōōn', a famous Moorish chieftain, was a native of Ronda, in Spain. In 859 A.D. he headed a rebel army, with which he laid waste the kingdom of Córdova and other parts of the empire. After having for a long time maintained himself against Mohammed, King of Córdova, he was totally defeated by him at Aybar in 882, and died in 883 A.D.

Omar Khayyam, khī-yăm', i.e., "Omar the Tent-maker," a Persian author and mathematician, (named in full GHIYATH-UD-DEEN ABULFATH OMAR BIN IBRAHEEM AL Khayyamee,) was born at Nishapoor about 1025. He was a friend of Nizâm-ul-Moolk, and of Hassan, who founded the sect of Assassins. He was the writer of a treatise on algebra, and the founder of the Seljook era in chronology, but is especially noted as the author of "Rubaiyat," a collection of some five hundred poetical epigrams, full of wit, pessimism, and philosophic mysticism. In 1883 E. H. Whinfield published the text with an English translation. Edward Fitzgerald's translation (of which an American edition has admirable illustrations by E. Vedder) is well known. Omar died at his native town in 1123.

O'mar (or O'mer) Pasha, (pă'shă',) Dey of Algiers, began to reign in April, 1815, after a revolution in which his predecessor had been killed. In 1816 the English admiral Exmouth, after failing in his efforts to procure the abolition of slavery in Algiers by negotiation, bombarded that city with success. Omar was forced to submit to the treaty dictated by the victor. In September, 1817, he was killed by his own mutinous troops.

Omar (or Omer) Pasha, o'mer pă'shă', (MICHAEL Lat'tas,) a Turkish commander, born in Croatia about 1805. About 1828 he removed to Turkey, changed his name to Omer, and adopted the Moslem religion. He became a colonel in the army in 1839, and a pasha about 1845. He suppressed a revolt in Bosnia in 1850–51. When the Crimean war broke out, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Turkish army. He defeated the Russians at Oltenitza, November, 1853, and at Kalafat in 1854. In the early part of 1855 he led an army to the Crimea and formed a junction with the Anglo-French army at Sebastopol. In 1868 he suppressed a formidable insurrection in Crete. Died in 1871.

O'Meara, o-mā'ra, (BARRY EDWARD,) the favourite physician of Napoleon at Saint Helena, was born in Ireland about 1780. Being on board the Bellerophon when the emperor was made prisoner, the latter requested that O'Meara might accompany him as his surgeon. He remained in Saint Helena till 1818, when he was recalled. In 1822 he published his "Napoleon in Exile; or, A Voice from Saint Helena," which had great popularity, and, though not entirely impartial, it is esteemed a valuable contribution to Napoleon's history. Died in 1836.

Omeyyades or Omeyyads, o-mā'yadz, [Fr. pron. o'mā'yăd',] sing. Omeyyade or Omeïade, o-mā'yad; written less correctly Ommaïades and Ommyïades, [Ger. OMEJJADEN, o-mī-yă'den, or OMAJJADEN, o-mă-yă'den; Lat. OMEI'ADÆ or OMAI'IADÆ,] the name of a famous dynasty of caliphs, founded (660 A.D.) by Moâweeyeh, the great-grandson of Omeyyah, (or Umeyyah,) who was cousin-german to Abd-el-Mŏŏt'alib, the grandfather of Mohammed; whence the Omeyyade princes are commonly styled "Benee- (Benî-) Omeyyah," (i.e. "Sons, or descendants, of Omeyyah.") The immediate successors of Moâweeyeh continued to reign at Damascus until 749 A.D., when their power was overthrown, and all the princes of the house of Omeyyah, (it is said,) except two, were put to death by order of Abool-Abbâs-Abdallah, (surnamed As-Seffâh, or "the shedder of blood,") the founder of the new dynasty of Abbassides. Of the two Omeyyade princes who escaped the vengeance of As-Seffâh, one fled to a remote part of Arabia; the other, named Abd-er-Rahman-Ibn-Moâweeyeh, went first to Egypt, thence to Spain, and established at Córdova (756 A.D.) a dynasty which was destined to rival in splendour and magnificence that of the Abbasside caliphs in the East. The power and glory of the Benee-Omeyyah in Spain culminated in the reign of Abd-er-Rahman I., who was the first of his line who assumed the title of caliph; but they began soon after to decline, and they may be said to have terminated with the reign of Hishâm II., in 1013.

Omeyyah, o-mā'yah, written also Omeyyeh, Ommaya, Umeyyah, and in various other modes, was a cousin of Mohammed's grandfather, Abd-el-Mŏŏt'alib. His great-grandson, Moâweeyeh, was the first caliph of the illustrious dynasty of the Benee-Omeyyah. (See OMEYYADES.)

O-nā'tas, [Gr. Ὀνάτας,] an eminent Greek sculptor and painter, born at Ægina, was the son of Micon, and flourished about 460 B.C. Among his best works were statues of Apollo, Hercules, and Mercury, and a picture of the expedition of the Argives against Thebes. His skill as a sculptor is highly extolled by Pausanias.

Onck'en, (JOHANN GERHARD,) a German minister, born at Varel, in Oldenburg, January 26, 1800. He removed to England, whence in 1823 he returned to Germany as an Independent minister and preacher. In 1834 he became a Baptist. He laboured for many years in propagating the Baptist faith in Germany with great success. Died at Zurich, January 2, 1884.

Ondegardo, de, dā on-dā-gaR'dō, (POLO,) a Spanish Jesuit and historian of the sixteenth century, was the author of historical memoirs of Peru, entitled "Relaciones," which are still in manuscript.

On'dẹr-donk, (BENJAMIN T.,) born in the city of New York in 1791, became Episcopal Bishop of Eastern New York about 1830, and was suspended for disgraceful conduct in 1845. Died in 1861.

Onderdonk, (HENRY USTICK,) D.D., an American bishop, a brother of Dr. B. T. Onderdonk, already noticed, was born in New York city, March 16, 1789. He at first became a physician, but in 1816 was made a priest of the Episcopal Church. In 1827 he was consecrated Assistant Bishop of Pennsylvania, and in 1836 succeeded Bishop White as diocesan. From 1844 to 1856 he was suspended from episcopal functions on the charge of intemperance. He was the author of various theological and religious works, and of some good hymns and poems. Died in Philadelphia, December 6, 1858.

O'Neall, o-neel', (JOHN BELTON,) LL.D., an American jurist, born near Bush River, South Carolina, in 1793, rose through various offices to be chief justice of his native State. He became in 1841 president of the State Temperance Society. He wrote "Biographical Sketches of the Bench and Bar of South Carolina," and other works. Died December 27, 1863.

O'Neil, o-neel', (HENRY,) an English historical and genre painter, born about 1818. Among his works are "By the Rivers of Babylon," "A Scene from Hamlet," "Eastward Ho! August, 1857," "Home Again! 1858," and "Mary Stuart's Farewell to France." Died in 1880.

O'Neill, (HUGH,) Earl of Tyrone, an Irish chieftain, who in 1587 received the earldom as lineal heir to Con, the first earl, to whom, however, his relationship was doubtful. In 1593 he was acknowledged as "The O'Neill." He formed an alliance with the O'Donnells and made war upon the English. The pope sent him a crown of peacocks' feathers. O'Neill outwitted and outgeneralled the Earl of Essex, but in 1601 he was compelled to surrender to Mountjoy. He was, however, pardoned, and retained the earldom. Being accused of treason, he left the country in 1607, and died at Rome in 1616. He was the last of the great Celtic chieftains or princes of Ireland, and his death was followed by the "Plantation of Ulster" and the ruin of the Catholic cause in the North of Ireland.

O'Neill, or O'Neal, (SHAN, SHANE, or JOHN,) an Irish chieftain, son and lawful heir of Con O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone. Con, however, declared his supposed illegitimate son Matthew his heir. But the O'Neill sept in 1559 chose Shan as the true O'Neill. From that time till his death, Ulster was the scene of almost continual warfare and excess. Shan always acknowledged Queen Elizabeth, but everywhere fought the Scots and the O'Donnells, displaying great energy and ability. He was finally overmatched by Sidney, was hunted from place to place, and was at last murdered by the O'Donnells, June 2, 1567.

Opie, (JOHN,) a distinguished English painter, born near Truro, in Cornwall, in 1761. Some of his portraits and sketches attracted the notice of Dr. Wolcott, the satirist, who took the young artist under his protection and introduced him into London society, where he enjoyed for a time the patronage of the fashionable world. He married as his second wife, in 1798, Miss Amelia Alderson, who afterwards obtained great popularity as a writer. Opie gave particular attention to historical subjects, and painted "The Death of Rizzio," "Jephthah's Vow," and "Belisarius." He succeeded Fuseli as professor of painting in the Royal Academy in 1806. Died in 1807.

See the "Monthly Review" for February, 1810.

O-pil'ĭ-us, (AURELIUS,) a Latin grammarian, who taught philosophy and rhetoric at Rome. He went into voluntary exile in 92 B.C. as a companion of his intimate friend Rutilius Rufus, who had been banished.

Opilius Macrinus. See MACRINUS.

O-pim'ĭ-us, (LUCIUS,) a Roman politician, was a leader of the aristocratic party, and adversary of Caius Gracchus. He became consul in 121 B.C., and a violent contest then ensued between the senate and the party of Gracchus. Having been authorized by the senate to decide the question by force, Opimius killed Gracchus and about three thousand of his partisans. According to Cicero, ("In Catilinam, Oratio I.,") Gracchus was killed on suspicion of sedition. Opimius was corrupted by Jugurtha in 112, fell into disgrace, and passed his latter years in exile. Died about 100 B.C.

See HETZEL, "Geschichte der Hebräischen Sprache."

Opitz, [Lat. OPI'TIUS,] (MARTIN,) a celebrated German critic and writer, born at Bunzlau, in Silesia, in 1597, is called the founder of the modern school of German poetry. He was crowned as poet-laureate by the emperor in 1628, and was appointed in 1638 historiographer to Ladislaus IV., King of Poland. His principal work is entitled a "Poem of Consolation amid the Disasters of War," (1621.) He also translated the Psalms, the "Antigone" of Sophocles, and other classics. Died in 1639. His essay on German versification ("Büchlein von der Deutschen Poeterei," 10th edition, 1668) was highly esteemed. He contributed greatly to the purity of the German language, into which he introduced a new prosody. "He is reckoned," says Hallam, "the inventor of a rich and harmonious rhythm. . . . No great elevation, no energy of genius, will be found in this German Heinsius and Malherbe. Opitz displayed, however, another kind of excellence. He wrote the language with a purity of idiom in which Luther alone, whom he chose as his model, was superior." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Oppenord, op'nor', (GILLES MARIE,) a French architect, born in Paris in 1672; died in 1742.

Oppert, op'pĕrt, (JULIUS,) a German Orientalist, of Jewish parentage, was born at Hamburg in 1825. He studied Arabic, Sanscrit, etc., and was naturalized as a citizen of France. He was sent by the French government, with F. Fresnel and F. Thomas, on a scientific mission to Mesopotamia in 1851, and began in 1857 to publish an account of the same, entitled "Expédition scientifique en Mésopotamie." He is distinguished as a decipherer of cuneiform inscriptions. Among his works are a "History of Chaldæa and Assyria" and a "Sanscrit Grammar."

Op'pĭ-an or Op-pĭ-ā'nus, [Gr. Ὀππιανός; Fr. OPPIEN, o'pe-ăN',] a celebrated Greek poet, born at Anazarba, in Cilicia, is supposed to have lived in the second century of the Christian era. Two poems, entitled "On the Chase," ("Cynegetica,") and "On Fishing," ("Halieutica,") are ascribed to him. The great superiority of the latter production to the former has led to the supposition that they were written by different persons. The author of the "Halieutica" is compared by Scaliger to Virgil for the harmony and graces of his style. It is said that Oppian was presented by the emperor Caracalla with a gold piece for every verse in his "Halieutica." Both poems display considerable knowledge of natural history, mingled with many errors and absurdities.

Opzoomer, op'zō'mẹr, (CARL WILLEM,) a distinguished Dutch jurist and philosopher, born at Rotterdam in 1821, was the author of a "Commentary on the Books of Civil Law in Holland," and a treatise "On Conservatism and Reform," (1852.) He became professor of philosophy at Utrecht in 1846. Died in 1892.

Or'ange, (FREDERIK HENDRIK van Nassau—vän năs'sŏw,) PRINCE OF, born at Delft in 1584, was the youngest son of William I. of Orange, surnamed "the Silent." His mother was a daughter of Admiral Coligni. He served in the army under his half-brother, Maurice of Nassau, and succeeded him as Stadtholder of the United Provinces in 1625. He prosecuted with ability the war against the Spaniards, from whom he took Maestricht in 1632 and Breda in 1637. As a general, he was prudent and mostly successful. He died in 1647, and was succeeded by his son, William II., who died in 1650, aged twenty-four. The latter had married Mary, a daughter of Charles I. of England, and left a son, who became William III. of England.

Orange, (MAURICE,) PRINCE OF. See NASSAU.

Or'ange, [Fr. pron. o'rônzh',] (PHILIBERT DE Châlons—shă'lôN',) PRINCE OF, a distinguished commander, born in Burgundy in 1502, was the son of the Baron of Arlay. He entered the service of Charles V. about 1521, and fought against the French. When Constable Bourbon was killed in the assault on Rome, in 1527, he succeeded to the command of the army, and compelled the pope to subscribe the conditions which he dictated. He became Viceroy of Naples in 1528, and was killed at the siege of Florence, in 1530. His nephew, René of Nassau, became his heir.

Orange, (WILLIAM [PRINCE] OF,) [Lat. GUILHEL'MUS (or GUILIEL'MUS) AURI'ACUS; Fr. GUILLAUME D'ORANGE, gẹ'yōm' do'rônzh'; Ger. WILHELM VON ORANIEN, wĭl'hĕlm fon o-rā'ne-en; Dutch, WILLEM VAN ORANJE, wil'lĕm vän o-rän'yẹh,] called also William the Silent, [Fr. GUILLAUME LE TACITURNE, gẹ'yōm' lẹh tă'se'türn',] the illustrious founder of the Dutch republic, was born at Dillenburg, in Nassau, in April, 1533. He was the eldest son of William, Count of Nassau, and was descended from an ancient sovereign family, one of whose members, Adolph of Nassau, had occupied the imperial throne. From his cousin-german René, who died in 1544, he inherited princely estates in Brabant, Flanders, and Holland, besides the small principality of Orange, in the southeast of France. He was educated as a Protestant by his parents; but about the age of fifteen he became a page of the emperor Charles V., who quickly discerned his excellent qualities and admitted him into his secret councils. Charles testified his confidence in the young prince by appointing him general-in-chief of the army in 1554, in the absence of the Duke of Savoy, and leaned on his shoulder at the ceremony of his own abdication, in 1555. William, who was regarded as the greatest Flemish subject of Spain, was one of the hostages given by Philip II. of Spain to Henry II. of France in 1559 for the execution of the treaty of Câteau Cambresis. Henry II., in conversation with his hostage, (whom he supposed to be a Catholic and to be privy to the secrets of the Spanish court,) imprudently revealed to him a plot which those two kings had formed to massacre all their Protestant subjects. "William earned," says Motley, "the surname of 'The Silent,' from the manner in which he received these communications from Henry without revealing to the monarch, by word or look, the enormous blunder which he had committed. His purpose was fixed from that hour." He was a Catholic nominally and in outward observance, but had then no dogmatic zeal,—perhaps no interest in questions of theology. Humanity and patriotism, however, determined him to counteract the cruel and tyrannical designs of the court. He acted with characteristic caution and secrecy in his opposition for several years, and continued to serve as Stadtholder of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, and councillor of state. A mutual but dissembled enmity existed between him and Philip II. In 1566 a great insurrection was provoked by the attempt of Philip to establish the Inquisition in all its rigour in the Netherlands. William refused to take a new oath of unlimited obedience, and offered to resign all his offices, in 1567. In the same year the famous Duke of Alva was sent with an army, and with supreme civil power as governor, to complete the subjection of the revolted provinces. In this crisis, Egmont, who had been the friend of the Prince of Orange, refused to co-operate with him in resistance to the impending invasion. By hastily retiring to Nassau, Orange escaped the doom which had been pronounced on him at Madrid. In February, 1568, a sentence of the Inquisition condemned to death as heretics all the inhabitants of the Netherlands, with a few exceptions. (Motley.) Having raised a large army, William entered Brabant in 1568, and offered battle to Alva, who declined to fight. At the end of the campaign, Orange was forced to disband his army for want of money to pay them. In 1572 many cities of Holland raised the standard of Orange, and the contest was maintained with desperate resolution through long years of adversity. He founded a famous republic by the union of the seven Protestant provinces of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Groningen, Overyssel, and Guelderland, in 1579, and was chosen Stadtholder. In 1584 he was assassinated by Balthazar Gerard, a fanatical Catholic. He left three sons, Philip, Maurice, (see NASSAU,) and Frederick Henry, the first of whom was seized by Alva in 1568, sent to Spain as a hostage, and detained many years in captivity.

"His enemies," says Motley, "never contested the subtlety and breadth of his intellect, his adroitness and capacity in conducting state affairs, and the profoundness of his views. In many respects his surname of 'the Silent' was a misnomer. William of Orange was neither 'silent' nor 'taciturn;'—yet these are the epithets which will be forever associated with the name of a man who in private was the most affable, cheerful, and delightful of companions, and who on a thousand public occasions was to prove himself, both by pen and speech, the most eloquent man of his age." To William the Silent is due the honour of being the first among European statesmen to make a practical application in government of the principle of religious toleration.

Orellana, o-rēl-yā'nā, (FRANCISCO,) a celebrated navigator, born at Truxillo, in Spain, in the sixteenth century. In 1531 he set sail with the brothers Pizarro for Peru. Having heard from the natives of a country in the east producing gold, silver, and spices, he set out in 1540, in company with Gonsalez Pizarro, on an exploring expedition. After following the course of the Napo, a branch of the Marañon, for about two hundred leagues, their provisions failed, and Orellana was directed to proceed down the river, obtain supplies, and return immediately. Instead of this, he continued his course along the main stream, though suffering severely from famine and from the attacks of the Indians. In August, 1541, he reached the mouth of the Marañon, to which he gave the name of Amazon, from the warlike women whom he states he encountered on its shores. On his return to Spain he obtained from Charles V. letters patent for colonizing the country he had discovered; but soon after reaching the Amazon, in 1549, he was attacked with fever, and died in 1550.

Orfila, or'fe-la, [Fr. pron. OR'fe'lā',] (MATHIEU JOSEPH BONAVENTURE,) an eminent physician and chemist, born at Mahon, in the island of Minorca, in 1787. Having been made a French citizen in 1818, he was appointed professor of medical jurisprudence and toxicology in the Faculty of Medicine in Paris in 1819. In 1823 he obtained the chair of chemistry in the same institution, which he continued to occupy for thirty years. He was created successively by Louis Philippe grand officer of the legion of honour, dean of the Medical Faculty, and member of the Council of Hospitals. Among his most important works are his "Treatise on Poisons, or General Toxicology," (1813; 4th edition, 2 vols., 1843,) "Elements of Chemistry applied to Medicine and the Arts," (2 vols., 1817–43,) "Treatise on Juridical Exhumations," (2 vols., 1830,) and "Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence," (4 vols., 1847.) Orfila was an accomplished and popular lecturer, and enjoyed the highest reputation as a writer on toxicology and legal medicine. He died in 1853, leaving large sums to the Academy of Medicine and the School of Pharmacy, for the promotion of science. He was the principal founder of the anatomical museum in Paris called the Musée Orfila.

Orford, EARL OF. See WALPOLE, (ROBERT,) WALPOLE, (HORACE,) and RUSSELL, (EDWARD.)

Or-get'o-rix, a rich and powerful chief of the Helvetii, whose intrigues are recorded in Cæsar's "Commentaries," book i. He aspired to the sovereign power, and persuaded the Helvetii to emigrate to Gaul. A judicial process was instituted against him for his ambitious projects; but before the decision he died,—as was supposed, by his own hand,—about 62 B.C.

Oriani, o-re-ä'nee, (BARNABA,) an eminent Italian astronomer, born near Milan in 1752. Having visited London in 1786, he made the acquaintance of Herschel, with whom he afterwards maintained a regular correspondence. On his return, he assisted Reggio and De Cesaris in measuring an arc of the meridian and executing the triangulation for a new map of Italy. When the astronomer Piazzi, in 1801, discovered Ceres, which he mistook for a comet, Oriani, by calculating its orbit, recognized it as a planet; and he was the first to determine the orbit of Uranus. After Napoleon was crowned at Milan, he created Oriani a count, and senator of the kingdom of Italy, and one of the first members of the Italian Institute. Among his principal works are "Tables of Uranus," (1785,) "Theory of the Planet Mercury," (1798,) and "Spherical Trigonometry," (1806.) The last-named is esteemed one of the most admirable treatises of the kind. Oriani was a member of the Institute of France and the Royal Society of London. Died in 1832.

Oribasius, or-e-bā'she-us, [Fr. ORIBASE, o're'bäz',] a celebrated physician, was a native of Sardis, in Lydia, or of Pergamus. He enjoyed the friendship of the emperor Julian, who made him his physician and in 361 A.D. appointed him quæstor of Constantinople. On the death of Julian, (363,) Oribasius was banished by Valentinian and Valens, but was recalled about 370 on account of his medical skill. Of his principal work, entitled "Medicinalia Collecta," (in seventy books,) less than half is extant. It was written at the request of the emperor, and, though principally a compilation from Galen and other physicians, contains some important original matter. It is also highly valued for its explanations of many passages in Galen's writings, and for the extracts it contains from works not extant. Oribasius was the first who described the salivary glands; he also advanced new ideas on dietetics and gymnastics. Died about 400 A.D.

Or'ĭ-gen, [Gr. Ὠριγένης; Lat. ORIG'ENES; Fr. ORIGÈNE, o're'zhăn',] one of the most remarkable, eloquent, and influential of the early Christian writers styled the Fathers, was born in Egypt about 186 A.D. He was the son of Leonides, a Christian martyr of Alexandria, and bore the additional name of ADAMANTIUS. He was a pupil of Clement of Alexandria, and became versed in grammar, rhetoric, logic, geometry, music, and philosophy. At the age of eighteen he was appointed by Bishop Demetrius to the office of catechist, the duties of which he performed with zeal and self-denial. He became very ascetic in his course of life, and mortified himself by a form of self-mutilation which he supposed to be recommended in Matthew xix. 12. Having learned the Hebrew language, he devoted himself to biblical studies. While passing through Palestine on a journey, about 228 or 230, he was ordained a presbyter at Cæsarea. This is said to have aroused the jealousy of Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, who excommunicated him and induced the Bishop of Rome and of other churches to concur in this sentence. In 231 Origen removed to Cæsarea, where he acquired a high reputation as a preacher and commentator on Scripture.

That he might be better qualified to make proselytes, he studied the Greek philosophy, of which he adopted the more noble and beautiful dogmas, and attempted to harmonize Platonism with Christianity. He made an innovation (which many think dangerous) in the mode of interpreting Scripture. His desire to find a mystical sense led him frequently into a neglect of the historical sense. In 235 he sought refuge from persecution in Cappadocia. He compiled about this time a valuable edition of the Old Testament, entitled "Hexapla," which exhibits in six columns the Hebrew text and various Greek versions. Fragments of the "Hexapla" have been preserved in the writings of the Fathers. He afterwards wrote an able defence of Christianity against Celsus, an Epicurean philosopher, which is still extant. Decius having renewed the persecution of the Christians in 250 A.D., Origen was imprisoned and subjected to torture, but survived, and was released a short time before his death, which occurred at Tyre in 253. The greater part of his numerous works are lost. His opinions gave rise to a great controversy long after his death. He held the doctrine of the universal restoration of sinners, and was charged with teaching the heretical notions which, after his time, prevailed under the name of Arianism. His defenders affirmed that the passages on which this charge was founded had been interpolated in his works. About the end of the fifth century, Origenism prevailed in Egypt and Syria; but it was condemned by the Council of Constantinople, in 553 A.D.

Origny, d', (PIERRE ADAM,) a French historian and antiquary, born at Rheims in 1697. His principal works are entitled "Ancient Egypt" and "Chronology of the Kings of the Egyptian Empire." Died in 1774.

O-rī'on, [Gr. Ὠρίων; It. ORIONE, o-re-o'nà,] a celebrated giant and hunter of classic mythology, was a son of Hyrieus. He loved Merope, a daughter of Œnopion, and once, when intoxicated, offered violence to her. Her father resented this act by depriving him of his eyes. He was befriended by Vulcan, was guided by Cedalion to the Sun-God, and recovered his sight. He was killed by Diana, whose motive is variously represented, and was placed among the stars.

Or'le-anē, DUKE OF, [Fr. DUC D'ORLÉANS, dük dor'lä'ôn',] (FERDINAND PHILIPPE LOUIS CHARLES HENRI,) a French prince-royal, born at Palermo in 1810, was the eldest son of King Louis Philippe. He was educated at the Collége Henri IV., and in 1832 received a medal for his services to patients who had the cholera in the hospital. In 1837 he married Helena of Mecklenburg. He served with the rank of general in Algeria in several campaigns between 1835 and 1840. He was thrown from his carriage and killed, near Neuilly, in July, 1842. He left two sons, the Count of Paris and the Duc de Chartres.

Orléans, d', (GASTON JEAN BAPTISTE DE FRANCE, DUC, a younger son of Henry IV. and Marie de Médicis, was born at Fontainebleau in 1608. He was created Duc d'Orléans in 1626, and married Mademoiselle de Montpensier. In 1630 he was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom. He quarrelled with Richelieu, by whom, according to Voltaire, he was persecuted. In 1632 he raised an army against the king, Louis XIII., and was supported by the Duke of Montmorency. The latter having been defeated in battle, Gaston made peace with the court, and was pardoned; but, when he learned that Montmorency was punished with death, he left France in anger. In 1642 he engaged in a conspiracy with Cinq-Mars and others against Richelieu, who detected the plot and induced Gaston to betray his accomplices or give evidence against them. At the death of Louis XIII., (1643,) Gaston was appointed lieutenant-general, and he commanded in several campaigns against the Spaniards. He took Gravelines in 1644, and Courtrai in 1646. In the civil war of the Fronde (1648–52) he displayed his usual inconstancy, and supported both sides by turns. He died, without male issue, in 1660.

Orléans, d', (HÉLÈNE LOUISE ÉLISABETH,) DUCHESSE, born at Ludwigslust in 1814, was a daughter of Frederick Lewis, Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. She married the prince-royal of France in 1837. After the abdication of Louis Philippe, February, 1848, she presented herself, with her minor son, the Count of Paris, before the Chamber of Deputies, and made an unsuccessful effort to obtain the regency. She died at Richmond, in England, in 1858.

Orléans, d', (HENRI,) PRINCE, son of the Duc de Chartres, was born in 1867. The law of exile of members of the royal family excluding him from France, he became, after 1887, an active traveller, traversing India, exploring Thibet with Bonvalot, and travelling in Arabia, Madagascar, Tonkin, and Abyssinia. He published "Six Months in India, Tiger Shooting," and, in collaboration with Bonvalot, "From Paris to Tonkin, across Unknown Thibet." His explorations and discoveries won him high honour from the geographical societies of France and other countries.

Orléans, d', (LOUIS.) See D'ORLÉANS.

Orléans, d', (LOUIS,) DUC, the second son of Charles V. of France, and the head of the first house of Orléans, was born in 1371. He married Valentina Visconti, a daughter of the Duke of Milan. After his brother, Charles VI., was rendered by insanity incapable of reigning, the kingdom was divided into two factions, of which the Duke of Orléans and the Duke of Burgundy were the rival chiefs. In 1407 the former was assassinated in Paris by Jean Sans Peur, Duke of Burgundy. A civil war followed between the Burgundians and Armagnacs, the latter of whom were partisans of the house of Orléans. Louis of Orléans left two sons, Charles and Jean. (See CHARLES D'ORLÉANS, and DUNOIS.) LOUIS, third Duke of Orléans, the son of Charles just named, became king, as Louis XII.

See ANSELME, "Histoire généalogique de la Maison de France aux Ducs d'Orléans."

Orléans, d', (LOUIS,) DUC, a son of Philippe, (1674–1723,) noticed below, was born in 1703, and was noted for his Christian virtues. He retired to a monastery in 1742, devoted much time to literature, and died in 1752, leaving his title to his son, noticed in the next article.

Orléans, d', (LOUIS PHILIPPE,) DUC, a grandson of the regent d'Orléans, and son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1725. He was the grandfather of Louis Philippe, King of the French. He served with distinction at Dettingen in 1743, was made lieutenant-general in 1744, and fought at Fontenoy and at Hastenbeck in 1757. He died in 1785, leaving a son, Louis Philippe Joseph, surnamed Égalité.

Orléans, d', (LOUIS PHILIPPE JOSEPH,) DUC, surnamed ÉGALITÉ, born at Saint-Cloud in 1747, was the son of the preceding, and was the first prince of the blood. He was styled the Duc de Chartres during the life of his father, and married the daughter of the Duc de Penthièvre. His fortune was immense. He courted popularity with success, and became alienated from the royal family, who appear to have treated him ill. He signalized his courage in a sea-fight against the English near Ushant in 1778. His Palais Royal in Paris became the focus of the ideas which caused the Revolution, and he came to be regarded as the chief of the popular party. In 1789 he was elected to the States-General, and, with the minority of the noblesse, joined the Tiers-État. The insurgents of July assumed the colours of his livery,—red, white, and blue. Some historians affirm that he instigated the attacks on the royal palace, and aspired to the throne. Lamartine defends him from this charge, but admits that he remains an enigma to posterity. "Through lack of audacity or of ambition," says he, "the Duke of Orléans never took the attitude of the rôle that opinion assigned to him. He respected or he despised the throne. Either of these sentiments exalts him in the eyes of history." His popularity declined. Wishing to be reconciled to the king, he went to court in 1791, but was insulted by the courtiers. He then allied himself with Danton for the subversion of the monarchy, renounced his title, assumed the name of ÉGALITÉ, and voted for the death of the king. By order of the Convention, he was imprisoned at Marseilles in April, 1793, and in November of that year he was executed at Paris by the Jacobins, apparently without any just grounds. His son, Louis Philippe, became King of the French.

Orléans, d', (PHILIPPE,) DUC, the founder of the present house of Orléans, was born in 1640. He was the only brother of Louis XIV., and a nephew of Gaston, Duke of Orléans, whose title he received in 1660. He married Henrietta, daughter of Charles I. of England, in 1661. In 1672 he joined the army, and distinguished himself in several campaigns against the Dutch. He defeated the Prince of Orange (afterwards William III.) at the battle of Cassel, in 1677. His daughter Marie Louise became the queen of Charles II. of Spain. He died in 1701, leaving his title to his son, Philippe, Regent of France.

See SAINT-SIMON, "Mémoires;" VOLTAIRE, "Siècle de Louis XIV;" W. COOKE TAYLOR, "Memoirs of the House of Orleans," 3 vols., 1849.

Orléans, d', (PHILIPPE,) DUC, Regent of France, a son of the preceding, was born at Saint-Cloud in 1674. He received at his birth the title of Duc de Chartres. He was endowed with superior talents, and made much progress in learning; but his heart was corrupted by his tutor, the Abbé Dubois. He entered the army at the age of seventeen, and displayed courage and skill at Steenkerke and Neerwinden. In 1706 he was appointed commander of the army of Italy, and was defeated at Turin by Prince Eugene. He had better success in Spain in 1707 and 1708. At the death of Louis XIV., in 1715, the Duke of Orléans became regent, with nearly absolute power, and in many respects reversed the policy of the government. His regency, though less despotic than the reign of Louis XIV., was a period of great profligacy in politics and morals. (See LOUIS XV.) The regent himself set the example of irreligion and licentiousness. He died in December 1723.

Orley or Orlay, van, vän or'lī, (BERNARD,) also called BARENT OF BRUSSELS, an eminent Flemish painter, born in 1490. He studied at Rome under Raphael, in several of whose works he had a part. On his return to Brussels he was employed by Charles V. to execute a number of models for tapestry, which were chiefly hunting-scenes and landscapes of remarkable beauty. Among his best historical pieces are a "Holy Family," a "Last Judgment," and "The Saviour Lamented by his Friends." Died about 1560.

Orley or Orlay, van, (RICHARD,) a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1652, was also an engraver. His design is said to be correct. Died at Brussels in 1732. His brother JAN, born about 1656, was a historical painter and engraver.

Orlof, Orlov, or Orlow, OR-lof', (ALEXIS,) COUNT, a Russian admiral, born about 1736. He was remarkable for his large stature, personal strength, and audacity. In 1762 he was an accomplice in the conspiracy which made Catherine autocrat of Russia in place of her husband, Peter III., whom he strangled with his own hands. He became an admiral, though he had not served in the marine, and commanded a naval expedition sent against the Turks, who were defeated by the Russians at Chesmé in 1770. It is said that he ordered a Russian frigate to be blown up in 1772, merely to furnish a model to the painter, Hackert, whom he employed to paint the battle of Chesmé. He died in 1808.

Orlof, Orlov, or Orlow, (ALEXIS,) COUNT, a famous Russian diplomatist and general, born in 1787, was a son of Feodor, noticed below. He entered the army in his youth, and served as adjutant to the grand duke Constantine in the war against Bonaparte. In 1825 he commanded a regiment of guards in the capital, and gained the favour of the Czar Nicholas by his zeal and efficiency in suppressing a great revolt of the troops. He was created a count, and received a high command in the army. In 1829 he negotiated the treaty of Adrianople, and was sent as ambassador to the Ottoman Porte. He was appointed commander of the army sent in 1833 to aid the Sultan against the Viceroy of Egypt, and negotiated the treaty of Unkiar-Skelesi. He was the intimate companion of Nicholas in his journey to England, Italy, and other countries. In 1856 he was the representative of Russia at the Congress of Paris, and signed a treaty of peace with France and England. He became in 1856 president of the Grand Council of the empire and ministry,—the highest functionary of Russia. Died in May, 1861. He left one son.

Orlof, Orlov, or Orlow, (FEODOR,) a Russian officer, born in 1741, was a brother of Alexis first above noticed, and father of the preceding. He distinguished himself in the war against the Turks, from whom he took Navarino in 1770, and afterwards rose to the rank of general-in-chief. Died in 1796.

Orlof, Orlov, or Orlow, (GREGORY,) a Russian courtier and general, born about 1734, was a brother of Alexis first above noticed. He served in the Seven Years' war, (1755–62,) and was one of the principal actors in the revolution which raised Catherine II. to the throne in July, 1762. About that time he became the favourite paramour of Catherine, and was appointed grand master of the artillery. It is stated that she proposed a secret marriage with him, but his ambition to reign with her as her acknowledged consort induced him to decline the offer. She was offended by this refusal, and supplied his place by a new favourite about 1772. Died in 1783.

See FREUDENREICH, "Die Familie Orloff als Mörder der Russischen Kaiser," 1832.

Orlof, Orlov, or Orlow, (GREGORY,) COUNT, born in 1777, was a nephew of Alexis first above noticed. He lived many years in Paris and Italy. He published, in French, "Travels in Part of France," (1824,) and "Memoirs, Historical, Political, and Literary, of the Kingdom of Naples." Died in 1826.

Orlof, (MICHAEL,) born in 1785, was a son of Feodor, noticed above. He served in several campaigns against Bonaparte, and in 1814 was one of the allied generals who received the capitulation of Paris. Having taken part in the secret associations formed in the Russian army in the latter part of Alexander's reign, he was disgraced in 1825, and passed the rest of his life in a private station. Died in 1841.

Orlofski, Orlovski, or Orlowski, OR-lof'skee, (BORIS IVANOVITCH,) a Russian sculptor, born in 1793, was sent by the government in 1822 to Italy, where he studied under Thorwaldsen. Among his master-pieces are a statue of "Paris with the Apple," (of Discord,) and a colossal bust of the emperor Alexander I. Died in 1837.

Orme, orm, (ROBERT,) a distinguished historian, of English extraction, born in 1728 at Anjengo, in Hindostan. He was appointed in 1754 a member of the Council at Fort Saint George, and was afterwards made a commissary and accountant-general. In this capacity he contributed greatly to establish British power in India, and on his recommendation the celebrated Clive obtained the military command in that country. He became historiographer to the East India Company, and in 1778 published his "History of the Military Transactions of the British in Hindostan." He also wrote "Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire of the Mahrattas," (1782.) Died in 1801.

See "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1807.

Ormea, d', dor-mā'â, (CARLO FRANCESCO VINCENZO Ferrero—fĕr-rā'ro,) MARQUIS, an Italian statesman, born at Mondovì. He was the chief minister of Charles Emmanuel, King of Sardinia, from 1730 until his death. Died in 1745.

See VOLTAIRE, "Siècle de Louis XV."

Or'merod, (ELEANOR A.,) an English entomologist, daughter of George Ormerod, the historian of Cheshire, took up the study of entomology in 1853, and was consulting entomologist to the Royal Agricultural Society 1882–92. She wrote largely on this subject, among her works being "Manual of Injurious Insects," (1881,) "Guide to Methods of Insect Life," (1884,) and "Agricultural Entomology," (1892.)

Ormesson, d', dor'mȧ'sôn', (HENRI FRANÇOIS DE PAULE LE FÈVRE,) a French financier, born in 1751. He was appointed controller-general of the finances in 1783, and removed a few months later. He was very incompetent for that office. Died in 1807.

Ormesson, d', (LOUIS FRANÇOIS DE PAULE LE FÈVRE,) a French judge, born in 1718, was a nephew of the noted orator and legislator, Chancellor d'Aguesseau. He became first president of the Parliament of Paris in 1788. Died in 1789.

Or'mond, (JAMES BUTLER,) first DUKE OF, an eminent statesman, born of an ancient Irish family in London in 1610, was the eldest son of Thomas Butler, Viscount Thurles. On the death of his grandfather, in 1632, he succeeded him as Earl of Ormond. The next year he went to Ireland, and became the friend and confidential adviser of the Earl of Strafford. In 1641 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army designed to suppress the Irish rebellion. He showed himself an able general, and defeated the rebels at Kilrush and Ross. He adhered constantly to the king during the civil war, and in 1644 was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, then a prey to fierce factions. He was compelled to surrender Dublin to the English Parliament in 1647, and retired to France.

Ormond was a favoured companion and adviser of Charles II. in his exile, and soon after his restoration he was created Duke of Ormond. In 1662 he was again chosen lord lieutenant of Ireland, which he governed with wisdom until 1668. In 1670 he was seized in London by a ruffian named Blood, who bound him and designed to hang him at Tyburn; but the duke was rescued by his servants. He died in 1688.

Ormond, (JAMES BUTLER,) second DUKE OF, born in Dublin in 1665, was a grandson of the preceding, and a son of the Earl of Ossory. He succeeded to the dukedom in 1688, and in the same year joined the standard of the Prince of Orange, who afterwards treated him with favour and confidence. He commanded the Life Guards at the battle of the Boyne, (1690,) and fought several ensuing campaigns in Flanders. From 1703 to 1706 he was Viceroy of Ireland, and in 1712 was appointed commander-in-chief of the British army in place of Marlborough. In compliance with secret orders from the ministry, he declined to co-operate with the allies against the French in Flanders. For this offence he was impeached by the Whigs in 1715, and, having escaped to France, was attainted. He then became a partisan of the Pretender, and obtained command of an armament which Spain sent against England, and which was dispersed by a storm. He died in exile in 1745.

Orms'by, (JOHN,) an Irish author, born in 1829. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and was the author of "Autumn Rambles in North Africa," (1864,) and "Stray Papers," (1876.) He was best known for his translations of "Don Quixote" and the "Poem of the Cid." The latter is the only complete translation in English, and closely preserves the spirit of the original. He died in 1895.

Ormuzd, or'mŭzd or or'mo͝ozd, [Gr. Ὡρομάσδης; Lat. OROMAS'DES, the AHURA-MAZDA of the Zend-Avesta,] written also Ormusd and Hormuzd, in the religion of the ancient Persians, the principle of light, purity, truth, and goodness, as opposed to Ahriman, (âh're-mân',) [in Latin, Arima'nes or Arima'nius,] the principle of evil and darkness. Ormuzd was considered to be the creator of whatever was good or beautiful in the universe. He not only created the world of light, including the firmament and all the heavenly luminaries, but also various orders of celestial or angelic beings, among which were the Amshaspands, presiding over the various kingdoms of the universe: one, for example, is the king of light, another the spirit of fire and of life; after these are the king of metals, the king of the seasons, and, lastly, the creator and protector of trees, flocks, and herds. Among the Amshaspands is reckoned also Sapandomad, the daughter of Ormuzd, and the mother of the human race. The next order of beings are the Izeds, who have charge of particular portions of nature. Some of these are male and some female. Of the Izeds, the most worthy of mention is Mithra or Mithras, the god of day, who presides over the light which mortals enjoy on earth. He is often identified with the sun; but he is more properly regarded as a being distinct and separate from the latter. Below the Izeds are the Fervers, who may be regarded as the original patterns or prototypes of all inferior beings. They are emanations from the essence of Ormuzd. According to Zoroaster, an incomprehensible being named Zeruane- (or Zervane-) Akerene (or "time without bounds") created both Ormuzd and Ahriman. The latter was originally pure, but, becoming envious of Ormuzd, he created orders of evil beings (Devs, or demons) corresponding to the celestial orders of Ormuzd. And in every part of the universe, even to the minutest particle of matter, the principle of Evil opposes the principle of Good. But after a certain period the power of Ahriman will be utterly overthrown, and all evil will come to an end. Some say Ahriman will be destroyed; others, that he will continue to exist, without the power to do evil.

Ornano, d', dor-nâ'no, called SAMPIERRO, (sâm-pe-ĕr'ro,) a general, born in Italy in 1497, entered the French army in 1533. In 1553 he defeated the Genoese in Corsica, which was annexed to France in 1557. Henry II. having restored it to the Genoese about 1560, D'Ornano invaded that island in 1564 and conquered part of it. He was assassinated in 1567.

O-ro'sĭ-us Pau'lus, [Fr. PAUL OROSE, pōl o'roz',] a Latin historian and Christian presbyter, who lived about 410–30 A.D., was a native of Tarragona, in Spain. He was a friend of Saint Augustine and Saint Jerome, and in several theological treatises opposed the doctrines of Origen and Pelagius. His principal work is entitled "Historiarum Libri VII. adversos Paganos," being a defence of Christianity against pagan writers, who asserted that since the overthrow of the old religion the world had suffered greater calamities. This history, though deficient in accuracy, contains much important information, and quotes from various authors whose writings are not extant. Among the translations of this work is one made by Alfred, King of England.

Orpheus, or'fūs or or'fe-us, [Gr. Ὀρφεύς; Fr. ORPHÉE, or'fā'; It. ORFEO, or-fā'o,] a mythical or semi-fabulous personage, who was celebrated in the legends of the ancient Greeks as a poet, musician, and inventor. His name does not occur in the poems of Homer or Hesiod, but is mentioned by Ibycus, Euripides, and Aristophanes. Plato refers to Orpheus and his works, calls him the son of Œagrus, and ascribes to him the origin of religious mysteries. He is supposed to have lived in Thrace not long before the Trojan war, or about 1200 B.C. According to tradition, Apollo presented him with a lyre, with which he enchanted wild beasts, trees, etc., lulled asleep the dragon that guarded the golden fleece, and rendered other important services in the Argonautic expedition. Virgil has commemorated in an admirable episode of his "Georgics" (book iv.) the descent of Orpheus to the infernal regions after his lost Eurydice. (See EURYDICE.) The poets relate that he was torn in pieces by Thracian women in their Bacchanalian orgies, because he neglected their sex or treated their charms with contempt.

O-si'ris, [Gr. Ὄσιρις,] the god of the Nile, and one of the principal divinities of Egypt, was said to be the husband of Isis and father of Horus. He was regarded as the author of Egyptian civilization, and the first who taught the arts and sciences to that nation. Tradition adds that he visited and civilized India, Arabia, and other countries, and after his return was murdered by Typhon. He was worshipped under the form of the bull Apis, into which it was supposed his soul migrated when he was slain by Typhon. Osiris and Isis are to be regarded as different manifestations of one divine principle, the former representing the beneficent power of nature in activity, the latter in passivity, so that neither is complete without the other; and hence Osiris, according to some, represented the life-giving power of the sun, and Isis the fertility of the earth.

See PLUTARCH, "Treatise on Isis and Osiris;" GUIGNIAUT, "Religions de l'Antiquité," Paris, 1825, book iii. chap. ii.; "Biographie Universelle," (Partie mythologique.)

Osirtesen I., called also Sesertesen and Usertesen, an Egyptian king of the twelfth dynasty. He conquered Ethiopia, repelled the negroes and Asiatics, founded the great temple of Karnak, and, according to some authors, seems to have been one of the Pharaohs under whom Joseph was in power, his chief officer, Ameni, somewhat resembling that patriarch; but if Lenormant's approximate date be correct, which assigns his dynasty to the thirty-first century B.C., the identification cannot be made good. Indeed, the later Egyptologists appear to reject it very generally.

Ossa, de, (JACQUES.) See JOHN XXII.

Ossat, d', do'sȧ', [Lat. OSSA'TUS,] (ARNAUD,) an able French diplomatist and cardinal, born near Auch in 1536. Having accompanied the ambassador Paul de Foix to Rome as his secretary, (1574,) he assisted in promoting a reconciliation between Henry IV. and the pope. He published a collection of "Letters," which are esteemed models of diplomatic sagacity, and are highly commended by Lord Chesterfield. De Thou dedicated to Cardinal d'Ossat his poem on the death of Henry III. Died in 1604.

Osselin, os'lăn', (CHARLES NICOLAS,) a French Jacobin and lawyer, born in Paris in 1754. He became in 1792 a member of the Convention, in which he took a prominent part in enacting laws against the emigrants. He was guillotined in June, 1794.

Ossenbeeck, os'sẹn-bāk', a skilful Dutch landscape-painter and engraver, born at Rotterdam in 1627. He worked many years in Italy, and adopted the Italian style. Died in 1678.

See DESCAMPS, "Vies des Peintres Flamands, Hollandais," etc.

Ossian, osh'e-an, a semi-fabulous Scottish bard and hero of the third century, was said to be the son of Fingal, King of Morven. A pretended translation of his poems, which was published by James Macpherson in 1765, gave rise to a spirited controversy among the English literati concerning the genuineness of these productions. (See MACPHERSON, and OISIN.)

Ossington, LORD. See DENISON, (JOHN E.)

Ossoli, os'so-lee, (originally SARAH MARGARET FULLER,) MARCHIONESS, an American lady, whose talents, rare individuality of character, and untimely death have given to her history a peculiar and tragic interest, was born at Cambridgeport, in Massachusetts, May 23, 1810. Under the care of her father, a lawyer and member of Congress, she was early and thoroughly instructed in the classics. It is related that he used to say of her, while still a child, that she "knew more Latin and Greek than half the professors." At a very early age she had also made great proficiency in French and Italian. After the death of her father, in 1835, she became teacher of languages in Boston, and subsequently principal of a school at Providence, Rhode Island. In 1839 she published a translation of Eckermann's "Conversations with Goethe." She became in 1840 editor of "The Dial," a periodical instituted for the advocacy and diffusion of Transcendentalism in America, and for which she wrote a number of admirable articles on literature and art. Her critique on Goethe especially, in the second volume of the "Dial," has been greatly and deservedly praised. "Nowhere," says Mr. Emerson, "did Goethe find a braver, more intelligent, or more sympathetic reader." Her "Summer on the Lakes," a vivid and truthful picture of prairie-life, was published in 1843. Soon after, she took charge of the literary department of the New York "Tribune." In 1846 she visited England, where she made the acquaintance of Carlyle and other eminent men. From London she journeyed through France to Italy. At Rome she accidentally became acquainted with the Marquis Ossoli, to whom, though many years younger than herself, she was married in December, 1847. She took the deepest interest in the cause of Italian liberty, and during the siege of Rome, in 1849, devoted herself with untiring assiduity to the care of the sick and wounded. In May, 1850, she and her husband set sail for America; but, a violent storm having arisen when they were near the coast of the United States, the vessel struck on Fire Island beach, Long Island, in the morning of the 19th of July, and a few hours after went to pieces. Among those who perished were the Marquis and Marchioness Ossoli and their child.

Os'so-rỹ, (THOMAS BUTLER,) EARL OF, a gallant commander, born probably in Ireland in 1634, was a son of the first Duke of Ormond. His biographer Lodge calls him a "model of almost universal perfection." Soon after the restoration of 1660 he obtained the rank of lieutenant-general, and in 1666 he was created an English peer, as Lord Butler. Having served with distinction in several sea-fights against the Dutch, he was raised to the rank of admiral about 1674. In 1677 he commanded the English troops that fought for the Prince of Orange at the battle of Mons. Died in 1680. His son became Duke of Ormond.

Ossuña or Osuña, os-soon'yȧ, [Fr. OSSONNE or OSSONE, o'son',] (Don PEDRO Tellez y Giron—tĕl-yĕth' e He-rōn',) DUKE OF, a celebrated Spanish statesman, born at Valladolid in 1579. After completing his studies at Salamanca, he repaired to the court of Philip II., from which, in consequence of indulging his caustic wit, he was banished. Having spent some time in France and Portugal, he returned to Spain on the death of Philip II., but he again had the misfortune to be exiled from the court. He was recalled to Spain in 1607, and was created a member of the council and knight of the golden fleece. Through his influence the independence of Holland was acknowledged in the treaty of 1609, and he opposed warmly, though unsuccessfully, the expulsion of the Moors, which took place about this time. In 1611 he was sent as viceroy to Sicily, and in 1616 filled the same office at Naples, where he defended the people against the oppressions of the nobles and the clergy. He gained a signal victory in 1617 over the Venetians, who had claimed exclusive rule over the Adriatic Sea. Having refused to introduce the Inquisition into Naples when required to do so by Philip III., and being suspected of aspiring to supreme power, Ossuña was superseded by Cardinal Borgia in 1620. He died in prison in 1624, after three years' imprisonment in Spain.

Ostade, van, vȧn os'tȧ'dĕh, (ADRIAN,) a celebrated painter and engraver, born at Haarlem in 1610, was a pupil of Rembrandt and of Frans Hals. His subjects were generally taken from low life, such as tavern scenes, peasants drinking and smoking, and the interiors of cottages. His pictures are exceedingly spirited and true to nature, and are distinguished for splendour and transparency of colouring. Among his best pieces are "The Fish-Market," "A Smoker Lighting his Pipe," and "The Family of Adrian van Ostade." He worked many years at Amsterdam, where he died in 1685.

See WEYERMAN, "De Schilderkonst der Nederlanders;" CHARLES BLANC, "Histoire des Peintres;" DESCAMPS, "Vies des Peintres Hollandais," etc.

Ostade, van, (ISAAC,) a painter, the youngest brother of the preceding, was born at Haarlem in 1621. His style resembled that of Adrian, whose pupil he was. He worked at Amsterdam, and painted landscapes which are greatly admired. He excelled in representing animals and in village scenes. His death occurred October 16, 1649.

Ostermann, os'tĕr-mȧn', (HEINRICH JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a celebrated diplomatist, born in Westphalia in 1686, assumed the name of ANDREI IVANOVITCH. In 1704 he entered the service of Peter the Great of Russia, for whom he negotiated the peace of Nystadt in 1721. After filling various high offices under Peter, he was, on the death of that monarch, patronized by the empress Catherine I., who made him vice-chancellor, and by her will appointed him governor to her son Peter II. and a member of the council of regency. In 1730 he was created a count by Peter II. After the accession of Elizabeth (1741) he was exiled to Siberia, where he died in 1747.

ANDER IVANOVITCH,) COUNT, a Russian general, born at Saint Petersburg about 1770. He served in the campaigns of 1806 and 1812, and distinguished himself particularly at the battle of Kulm, (1813.) He was afterwards made general-in-chief of engineers by the emperor Alexander. Died in 1837.

See THIERS, "History of the Consulate and the Empire."

Ostervald, os'tẹr-vâlt', (JEAN FRÉDÉRIC,) a Swiss Protestant divine, eminent for learning and piety, born at Neufchâtel in 1663. He published an "Abridgment of the History of the Bible," an edition of the Bible in French, which is called by his name, "Christian Ethics," and a "Catechism." He preached many years at Neufchâtel. Died in 1747.

Ostrog, os'trog, (CONSTANTINE,) DUKE OF, a Polish nobleman, distinguished himself by his hostility to the Jesuits and to the union of the Greek and Roman Churches. He endeavoured at the Synod of Thorn to effect a union with the Protestants of Poland. He published in 1581 the old Slavonian translation of the Bible called by his name. Died in 1608.

Ostrog, (CONSTANTINE VASILII,) was created by Sigismund, King of Poland, grand commander of Lithuania, and in 1514 obtained a brilliant victory over the Russians at Orsza.

Ostrovsky or Ostrowski, os-trof'skee, (A. N.,) a popular Russian dramatist of the present age. He began his literary career about 1850. His works were published in 4 vols., 1859–67. Died in 1882.

Os'wald, (FELIX LEOPOLD,) a Belgian author, was born at Namur in 1845. He graduated at Brussels in 1865, went to Mexico with the Belgian volunteers in 1866, and acted as correspondent of French and English journals 1878–97, residing in the United States. He wrote various works of travel and natural history, including "Summerland Sketches," "Days and Nights in the Tropics," etc.

Os'wald, SAINT, King of Northumbria, born in 604 or 605 A.D. He defeated Cadwalla, King of Wales, and was killed in a battle against Penda, King of Mercia, in 642 A.D.

Os-ŷ-man'dy-as, an ancient Egyptian king, to whom the Memnonium and other magnificent structures of Thebes are attributed, is supposed to have flourished about 2000 B.C. His name, according to Strabo, is only a variation of Ismandes. He is also famed for his conquests over the Bactrians, and his exploits were represented on the walls of an immense temple which he built at Thebes. This edifice, which was esteemed one of the most beautiful of antiquity, contained the first library of which we have any account.

Ot-ạ-cil'i-ạ Se-ve'rạ, (MARCIA,) wife of the Roman emperor M. Julius Philipous, lived about 250 A.D.

O'tey, (JAMES HERVEY,) D.D., an American bishop, born at Liberty, Virginia, January 27, 1800, graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1820, in 1827 was ordained a priest of the Episcopal Church, and in 1834 was consecrated Bishop of Tennessee, the first of the title. Died April 23, 1863.

Otfried, ot'frẽt, [Lat. OTFRI'DUS,] a learned German monk of the ninth century, supposed to have been a native of Franconia. His poetical version of the Gospels, published about 868, is regarded as one of the most valuable monuments of the old German language.

Othmân-Ibn-Affân, oth'mân' ĭb'n âf'fân', the third of the caliphs who succeeded Mohammed, was a distant relative and a devoted follower of the prophet. He was invested with the caliphate in 644 A.D. He made extensive conquests in Persia, Africa, and the island of Cyprus, but he rendered himself unpopular by the favours he lavished upon his relatives and friends. Through the intrigues of Ayeshah, widow of the prophet, and a number of disaffected nobles, a conspiracy was formed against his life, and he perished by the hand of Mohammed, son of the caliph Aboo-Bekr, in 656 A.D. Othmân was married successively to two daughters of the prophet Mohammed.

Othmân-Ibn-Yahya-Alkaisee, (-Alcaisi,) oth'mân' ĭb'n yâ'he-â âl-ki'see, a Spanish Arab of distinguished talents and learning, was born at Málaga in the thirteenth century, and rose to be governor of that city. He wrote treatises "De Hæreditate" and "De Mensuris Hispanis," and a work entitled "Grammatical Questions," ("Quæsita Grammatica.") Died in 1334.

O'tho, [Fr. OTHON, o'tôn',] (MARCUS SALVIUS,) Emperor of Rome, born about 32 A.D., was descended from a patrician family. He was for a time an intimate associate of Nero, until the attachment of the latter for Poppæa, Otho's wife, caused a rupture between them. He supported Galba in his revolt against Nero, in 68 A.D., but, disappointed that the former did not appoint him his successor, he conspired with the guards, took the life of Galba, and assumed the supreme power. He soon after marched against Cæcina, a general of Vitellius, who had been proclaimed emperor by the legions in Germany. His army having been totally defeated near Bebriacum, Otho destroyed himself in April, 69 A.D., and was succeeded by Vitellius. Otho was a man of profligate character.

O'tho [Fr. OTHON, o'tôn'; Ger. OT'TO] I., THE GREAT, son of Henry I., was born in 912 A.D., and succeeded his father as Emperor of Germany in 936. Soon after his accession he was involved in a protracted war with Boleslaw, Duke of Bohemia, whom he compelled to acknowledge his supremacy, (950.) He repressed the arrogance of the feudal barons, founded numerous bishoprics, and was zealous in his efforts to propagate Christianity. He defeated Harold, King of the Danes, whom he obliged to be baptized and to become tributary to Germany. In 951 he went to the assistance of the Italians against the usurper Berengarius, who had murdered King Lotharius and imprisoned Adelaide, his queen, whom Otho married the same year. He was crowned emperor at Rome by Pope John XII. in 962, and assumed the title of Cæsar. The pope, having soon after conspired with the enemies of Otho, was deposed by him, and Leo VIII. elected in his place. In 972 his son, Otho II., whom he had previously caused to be crowned at Rome, married the princess Theophania, daughter of Nicephorus Phocas, Emperor of the East. Otho died in 973. "He deserves," says Sismondi, "more than Charlemagne the name of Great, because his reign had a much more salutary influence on the nations whom he subjected." Other historians, however, have expressed a different opinion.

See VEHSE, "Leben Otto des Grossen," 1829; BOEHMER, "Re gesta Ottonum;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Otho (Otto) II., Emperor of Germany, born in 955, succeeded his father, Otho I., in 973. King Lothaire of France, having renewed his pretensions to Lorraine, was opposed and signally defeated by Otho. In 980 he concluded a treaty by which the investiture of Lower Lorraine was given to Charles, the brother of Lothaire, on condition of his doing homage to the German emperor. He afterwards attempted the conquest of Calabria and Apulia, but was defeated in 982 by the combined forces of the Greeks and Saracens. He died in 983, and was succeeded by his son, Otho III.

See DIETMAR, "Chronicon;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Otho (Otto) III., Emperor of Germany, son of the preceding, was three years of age at his father's death. He was crowned at Rome by Pope Gregory V. in 996. While he was engaged in a war with the Slavi, Crescentius, a Roman patrician, deposed Gregory V. and elected in his stead a Greek under the name of John XVI. Otho advanced into Italy, (998,) defeated Crescentius and put him to death, and restored the former pope. He died, without issue, in 1002, and was succeeded by Henry II of Bavaria.

See RICHER, "Chronicon;" F. D. RING, "Kaiser Otto III.;" BOEHMER, "Re gesta Ottonum;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Otho (Otto) IV., Emperor of Germany, born about 1174, was the son of Henry the Lion, Duke of Bavaria, and Matilda, daughter of Henry II. of England. He was educated at the court of his uncle, Richard Cœur-de-Lion, whom he assisted in his wars against Philip Augustus of France. In 1197 he was chosen emperor by a portion of the electors, while others declared for Philip, Duke of Suabia, which gave rise to a ten years' war. Pope Innocent III. having favoured the pretensions of Otho, he was crowned at Rome in 1209, and in return for this favour conceded to the papal see the right of investiture. Otho soon quarrelled with the pope, at whose instigation many German princes and prelates revolted in 1212 and elected Frederick of Hohenstaufen as emperor. Otho was defeated at the great battle of Bouvines, in 1214, by Philip Augustus of France. He died in 1218.

O'tho or Ot'to, King of Greece, born in 1815, was a son of Lewis I., King of Bavaria. He was elected king by the Greeks in 1832, and their choice was confirmed by a treaty between France, England, and Russia. He married Amalia, a daughter of the Grand Duke of Oldenburg, in 1836. His reign was unpopular, and was disturbed by insurrections. He abdicated in October, 1862. Died in 1867.

See "Blackwood's Magazine" for October, 1854, and November, 1863.

O'tho, (LUCIUS SALVIUS,) a Roman commander, the father of the emperor Otho, was a favourite of Tiberius. He was consul in 33 A.D., and afterwards proconsul in Africa. He detected a conspiracy against the life of Claudius.

Otho, o'to, (VENIUS,) a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1556, was one of the instructors of Rubens. He worked some years at Rome. Died in 1634.

Otho OF BRANDENBURG, a German poet, and Margrave of Brandenburg, was called OTHO WITH THE ARROW. Died in 1304.

Otho (or Otto) von Freisingen, o'to fon frī'zing'ẹn, one of the early German chroniclers, was the son of Leopold IV., Margrave of Austria, and Agnes, daughter of the emperor Henry IV. In 1137 he was appointed Bishop of Freisingen by his half-brother, the emperor Conrad III. He was the author of a "Chronicle of the World from the Creation to his Own Time," in seven books. The first part is chiefly a compilation from other historians, but the last contains information of great value relative to German history, being drawn from the most authentic sources. He also wrote a "History of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa." Died in 1158.

O'tis, (ELWELL STEPHEN,) an American general, was born at Frederick City, Maryland, in 1838. During the civil war he served in the Union army, and after the war was made lieutenant-colonel of regulars, rising to brigadier-general in 1893. He was appointed major-general of volunteers in May, 1898, and sent to the Philippines, taking principal command on the departure of General Merritt for Paris. He served as military governor and commander-in-chief during the rebellion, until the spring of 1900, when he resigned, and was promoted major-general in the United States army.

O'tis, (HARRISON GRAY,) an American statesman and orator, born in Boston in October, 1765, was a nephew of James, noticed below, and a son of Samuel Allyne Otis. He graduated at Harvard College in 1783, practised law in Boston, and was elected a member of Congress in 1796. He became a leader of the Federal party, and was highly distinguished for his graceful eloquence. He was president of the senate of Massachusetts for several years between 1805 and 1812, was a member of the Hartford Convention in 1814, and was a Senator of the United States from 1817 to 1822. In 1820 he made a speech in the Senate against the extension of slavery. He retired from public life in 1832. Died in Boston in October, 1848.

Otis, (JAMES,) a celebrated American orator and patriot, born at West Barnstable, in Massachusetts, on the 5th of February, 1725, was a son of James Otis, a judge and lawyer. He graduated at Harvard College in 1743, studied law, and became a resident of Boston about 1750. He was profoundly versed in classical literature, and in 1760 published an able work entitled "Rudiments of Latin Prosody, with a Dissertation on Letters," etc. He acquired distinction in 1761 by an argument against the writs of assistance for which the officers of the customs had applied. Referring to this speech, John Adams said, "Otis was a flame of fire: with a promptitude of classical allusions, a depth of research, a rapid summary of historical events and dates, a profusion of legal authorities, a prophetic glance of his eyes into futurity, and a rapid torrent of impetuous eloquence he hurried away all before him. American independence was then and there born. Every man of an immense, crowded audience appeared to me to go away, as I did, ready to take up arms against writs of assistance." The judges suspended or evaded the decision of the question. He was elected a member of the legislature in 1762, and became the leader of the popular party. He was a delegate to the Congress which met at New York in 1765, and which was called "the Stamp-Act Congress." He wrote several pamphlets in defence of the colonies against the arbitrary measures of the British ministry. In September, 1769, he was assaulted by several ruffians of the opposite party, and received a severe wound in the head, in consequence of which he became partially deranged, or permanently disqualified for usefulness. A man named Robinson was sentenced to pay £2000 for this assault, but the fine was remitted by Otis. He had married Ruth Cunningham, of Boston. He was killed by lightning at Andover in May, 1783.

Ot'way, (Sir ROBERT,) an English admiral, born in 1772; died in 1846.

Otway, (THOMAS,) a celebrated English dramatist, born in Sussex in 1651. Having been unsuccessful as an actor, he applied himself to dramatic writing, and in 1675 published his tragedy of "Alcibiades." This was soon followed by "Don Carlos," which was received with great favour. In 1677 he obtained from the Earl of Plymouth a situation as cornet of dragoons in the army of Flanders; but, soon becoming dissatisfied with military life, he again gave his attention to the drama. In 1680 the tragedy of "The Orphan" appeared, and in 1682 his "Venice Preserved." These two are characterized by Hallam as "having a deep pathos, a dramatic eloquence rapid and flowing, and sometimes very graceful poetry;" and he adds, "The 'Venice Preserved' is more frequently represented than any tragedy after those of Shakspeare." Among Otway's other plays we may cite "Caius Marius," and a comedy called "The Soldier's Fortune." He also translated and remodelled the "Titus and Berenice" of Racine, and Molière's "Fourberies de Scapin." He died in 1685, in a state of extreme destitution; and some accounts state that his death was caused by hunger.

See JOHNSON, "Lives of the Poets," and "Life of Otway," prefixed to the edition of his works, 1813.

Oudaen, ŏw'dăn, (JOACHIM,) a Dutch tragedian, born in 1628; died in 1692. His best-known plays are "Johanna Gray" (1648) and "Konradyn," (1649.)

Oudenaerde. See AUDENAERDE.

Oudendorp, van, vȧn ŏw'dẹn-dorp', (FRANS,) an eminent Dutch philologist, born at Leyden in 1696, was for many years professor of history and rhetoric in his native city. He published excellent editions of Julius Obsequens, Lucan, Suetonius, and other classics, and was the author of a treatise "On the Use of Ancient Inscriptions." Died in 1761.

Oudet, oo'dȧ', (JACQUES JOSEPH,) a French officer, born at Meynal in 1773, was a zealous republican. He was an active member of the secret society called Philadelphes. He was killed at Wagram in 1809.

See NODIER, "Histoire des Sociétés secrètes," 1814.

Oudin, oo'dăN', (CASIMIR,) a French bibliographer, born at Mézières in 1638. He published a "Commentary on Ancient Ecclesiastical Writers," and several other works. Died in 1717.

Oudin, (FRANÇOIS,) a learned French Jesuit, born in Champagne in 1673. He wrote a number of elegant Latin poems, and theological and biographical treatises. Died in 1752.

Oudiné, oo'de'nȧ', (EUGÈNE ANDRÉ,) an eminent French sculptor and engraver of medals, born in Paris in 1810. He gained the grand prize of Rome in 1831, a medal of the first class in 1839 for engraving, and a medal of the first class for sculpture in 1843. Among his engraved works is a medal entitled the "Apotheosis of Napoleon I." Died in 1887.

Oudinet, oo'de'nȧ', (MARC ANTOINE,) a French antiquary, born at Rheims in 1643, was appointed keeper of the medals in the Royal Cabinet in Paris. In 1701 he became a member of the Academy of Inscriptions. He published several valuable treatises on medals. Died in 1712.

Oudinot, oo'dee'nō', (ACHILLE FRANÇOIS,) a Franco-American painter, born at Damigny, (Orne,) April 18, 1820. He was educated at the communal college of Alençon. He studied architecture and designing, by means of which he maintained himself in later years while carrying on his studies in painting. He served in the revolution of 1848, and in the Franco-German war, 1870–71. Under the Commune he was conservator of the museums of the Louvre. He designed and constructed the admirable Daubigny studio, and made many of its interior decorations and paintings. He also won distinction as a glass-painter, and received several medals, chiefly foreign. In 1876 he came to the United States, and settled in Boston as an American citizen. He painted many evening-, forest-, and river-scenes, and exerted an excellent influence as a teacher, but subsequently returned to Paris. Died about 1890.

Oudinot, oo'de'no', (CHARLES NICOLAS VICTOR,) Duc de Reggio, a general, a son of the following, was born at Bar-le-Duc in 1791. He served as captain in the Russian campaign, (1812,) and became a maréchal-de-camp in 1822. He commanded the French army sent in 1849 to Rome to protect the pope against his subjects. Having occupied the city after a short siege, July, 1849, he returned to France. He opposed Louis Napoleon in the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, after which he was not employed in public service. Died in 1863.

Oudinot, (NICOLAS CHARLES,) Duc de Reggio, (rȧ'zho',) a distinguished French general, was born at Bar-sur-Ornain in 1767. He obtained the rank of colonel in 1793, and resisted about 10,000 Austrians with one regiment for eight hours in 1794. For this service he was raised to the rank of a general of brigade. He took Treves in 1794, and received five wounds in an action near Mannheim in October, 1795. In 1799 he became a general of division, and chief of the staff in the army of Massena, under whom he served at the siege of Genoa, in 1800. Having received command of ten battalions of grenadiers in 1805, he performed a prominent part in the capture of Vienna, and took a bridge over the Danube which was defended by about one hundred and eighty pieces of cannon. He rendered important services at Austerlitz in 1805, and gained a victory at Ostrolenka in 1807. At the battle of Friedland, June, 1807, he resisted for a number of hours an army of about 75,000 Russians, and gave time to the rest of the French army to gain the victory. He maintained his reputation in 1809 at Landshut, Lobau, Vienna, and Wagram. He was raised to the rank of marshal of France in July, 1809, and received the title of Duc de Reggio in the same year. In 1813 he served at Lutzen and Bautzen, and was defeated by Bernadotte at Gross-Beeren. During the Hundred Days he adhered to Louis XVIII., who gave him a high command in 1815. He commanded a corps of the army which invaded Spain and took Madrid in 1823. Died in 1847.

Oughtred, ŏt'rĕd, (WILLIAM,) an English divine and eminent mathematician, born in Buckinghamshire in 1573. He wrote "The Description and Use of the Double Horizontal Dyall," "Clavis Mathematica," and a "Treatise on Trigonometry." He is styled by Fuller "the prince of mathematicians.' Died in 1660.

Ouida. See DE LA RAMÉ, (LOUISE.)

Ouless, oo-less', (WALTER WILLIAM,) a British painter, born at Saint Hélier, Jersey, September 21, 1848. He was educated at Victoria College, in Jersey, and at the Royal Academy. In 1872 he devoted himself to portrait-painting, in which he won high distinction.

Oultreman, d', dootr'mŏn', [Lat. OULTREMAN'NUS,] (HENRI,) a Flemish writer, born at Valenciennes in 1546, was the author of a "History of the Town and County of Valenciennes from its Origin to the End of the Sixteenth Century." Died in 1605.

Oultreman, d', (PIERRE,) a historian, a son of the preceding, was born at Valenciennes in 1591. He wrote a "Life of Peter the Hermit," (1632,) and a History of Baldwin and Henry, Emperors of Constantinople, ("Constantinopolis Belgica," etc., 1643.) Died in 1656.

Oultremannus. See OULTREMAN.

Oury, oo'ree or oo'ree', (ANNA CAROLINA, née de Belleville), a celebrated pianist and composer, born in Bavaria, of French parentage, in 1806. In 1831 she married M. Oury, a violinist, with whom she made a tour of the European cities. In 1839 the couple settled in England. Madame Oury retired in 1866, and died in 1880.

Ousel, (PHILIP.) See OISEL.

Ouseley, ooz'lee, (Sir FREDERICK ARTHUR GORE,) an English musician, a son of Sir Gore Ouseley, noticed below, was born in London August 12, 1825. He composed several anthems, and wrote treatises on "Harmony," (1869,) "Counterpoint and Fugue," (1869,) etc. In 1855 he was appointed professor of music at Oxford. Died April 6, 1889.

Ouseley, ooz'lee, (GIDEON,) an Irish Methodist minister, born at Dunmore in 1762. He laboured as a missionary among the Irish. Died in 1839.

Ouseley or Ously, (Sir GORE,) a diplomatist, born in Ireland in 1769. He was sent as ambassador to Persia about 1810, and published "Biographical Notices of Persian Poets," (1846.) Died in 1844.

Ouseley or Ously, (Sir WILLIAM,) Viscount Claremont, an Orientalist, brother of the preceding, was born in 1771. He published "Travels in Various Countries of the East, more particularly Persia," (1831.) Died in 1842.

Outhier, oo'te-ā', (REGINALD or RENAULD,) a French astronomer, born in Poligni in 1694. In 1736 he accompanied Maupertuis and other savants on a scientific expedition to Lapland, of which he afterwards published an interesting account. He was a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences, and member of the Royal Society of Berlin. Died in 1774.

Outram, oo'trăm, (Sir JAMES,) an English general, born in Derbyshire in 1803, was a son of Benjamin Outram, an eminent civil engineer, who died in 1805. He went to India about 1820, served in the war against Dost Mohammed, and became British resident at Hyderabad and Lucknow. In 1856 he was appointed commander of a successful expedition against Persia. During the Sepoy mutiny of 1857 he returned to India, and superseded Havelock as commander of the army at Lucknow. (See HAVELOCK.) Died in 1863.

Outram, written also Owtram, (WILLIAM,) a learned English theologian, born in Derbyshire in 1625. He became prebendary of Westminster in 1670. He was versed in rabbinical learning and in the writings of the Fathers. His chief work is a treatise on sacrifices, "De Sacrificiis Libri duo," (1677.) Died in 1679.

Ouvarof. See OOVAROF.

Ouvrard, oo'vrăr', (GABRIEL JULIEN,) a French financier, born near Clisson in 1770. He was a bold and successful speculator, and enriched himself by his operations as contractor during the war of the Revolution. He was prosecuted by Napoleon I., and imprisoned some years. Died in 1846.

See his autobiographic "Mémoires sur ma Vie," 3 vols., 1826; "Biographie Universelle."

Ouvrard, (RENÉ,) a French ecclesiastic, born at Chinon about 1620, published treatises on music, theology, and mathematics. He was intimate with Arnauld and other writers of Port-Royal. Died in 1694.

Ouvrié, oo'vre-ā', (PIERRE JUSTIN,) a French landscape-painter, born in Paris in 1806. Died in 1879.

Ouwater, van, văn ŏw'wā'tẹr, (ALBERT,) a Dutch painter, born at Haarlem in 1444, was one of the first artists in Holland who painted in oil. Among his master-pieces are "The Resurrection of Lazarus" and "The Descent from the Cross." The latter was warmly eulogized by Albert Dürer. Died in 1515.

Ovalle, de, dā o-vāl'yā, (ALFONSO,) sometimes written Ovaglie, a Jesuit, of Spanish extraction, born in Chili in 1601. He published in 1646 a "Historical Account of the Kingdom of Chili and the Jesuit Missions in that Country." Died in 1651.

Ovando, o-vän'do, (NICOLAS,) a Spanish officer, and commander of the order of Alcántara, succeeded Bobadilla as governor of Hispaniola in 1501. While his rule over the Spanish colonists was marked by justice and kindness, he has incurred lasting reproach by the cruelties he perpetrated on the Indians, a great number of whom were massacred at Xaragua by his orders. He also treated Columbus with great injustice, and availed himself of every opportunity of thwarting his designs. He was recalled to Spain in 1508, and succeeded by Diego Columbus, son of the celebrated admiral. Died in 1518, aged about fifty-eight.

See CHARLEVOIX, "Histoire de Saint-Domingue;" OVIEDO, "Cronica de las Indias."

O'vẹr-all, (JOHN,) a learned English prelate, born in 1559. He rose through several preferments to be Bishop of Norwich in 1619. His principal work is entitled "The Convocation-Book," in which he maintains the divine origin of government. Bishop Overall was esteemed the best scholastic divine of his time in England. He was the friend and correspondent of Grotius and Gerard Vossius. Died in 1619.

Overbeck, o'vẹr-bĕk', (FRIEDRICH,) one of the most illustrious German painters of the nineteenth century, was born at Lubeck in 1789. After having studied for a time at Vienna, in 1810 he visited Rome, where, with Cornelius, Schnorr, and other German artists, he became one of the founders of what has been styled the romantic or symbolic school of painting in Germany. Among his earliest productions were the frescos at the villa of the consul-general Bartholdy, representing "Joseph sold into Captivity," and "The Seven Years of Famine." In 1817 he adorned the villa of Marquis Massimi with five large frescos taken from Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered." His magnificent fresco at Assisi, representing "The Miracle of Roses of Saint Francis," is esteemed his master-piece in that department. Among his best oil-paintings are "The Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem," in the Marienkirche at Lubeck, "Christ on the Mount of Olives," "The Death of Saint Joseph," and the large picture in the Städelschen Institut at Frankfort-on-the-Main, entitled "The Influence of Christianity in the Arts." He has also produced a number of elegant designs, among which are "Forty Illustrations from the Gospels," since engraved by Keller, Bartoccini, and others. Regarding art as the handmaid of religion, Overbeck has almost exclusively chosen scriptural subjects, and his works are characterized by deep devotional feeling, simplicity, and touching sweetness of expression. According to some writers, Overbeck's influence and reputation in Germany have considerably declined of latter time. Died in 1869.

Overbeck, (JOHANNES ADOLF,) a German scholar, a nephew of Friedrich Overbeck, was born at Antwerp, March 7, 1826. He took his doctor's degree at Bonn in 1850, in 1853 became an extraordinary professor at Leipsic, and in 1859 full professor, and director of the Archæological Museum. Among his works are a "Gallery of the Heroic Creations of Greek Art," (1851–53,) "History of Greek Plastic Art," (1857–58,) and "Art-Mythology of Greece," (1871–73.) Died in 1895.

Overbeek, van, vän o'vẹr-bāk', (BONAVENTURE,) a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1660. He went to Rome, and made numerous designs of the antiquities of that city. Having returned to Holland, he died in 1706, leaving a work entitled "Reliquiæ antiquæ Urbis Romæ," (1707–09.)

See DESCAMPS, "Vies des Peintres Flamands, Hollandais," etc.

Overbury, o'vẹr-bẹr-e, (Sir THOMAS,) an English author and courtier, born at Compton-Scorfen, Warwickshire, in 1581. By his talents and learning he acquired influence with Carr, who became the favourite of James I. and was created Earl of Somerset. For advising against the marriage of Carr with the infamous Countess of Essex, Overbury was committed to the Tower, (1613.) After a confinement of several months, he was poisoned by order of Somerset and his wife, who were convicted of the crime but pardoned. He left a popular poem called "The Wife," (1614,) and a prose work entitled "Characters," which is praised for wit and ingenuity. "'The Fair and Happy Milkmaid,' often quoted," says Hallam, "is the best of his characters."

O'vẹr de Lin'dẹn, (CORNELIS,) a Frisian writer, born in 1811. He was a ship-carpenter, and worked in the royal dock-yards at the Helder. He wrote the famous "Oera Linda Boek," in the Frisian tongue. This strange book was a forgery: the author pretended that it was in part copied in 1256 from ancient documents, and for a time it attracted a great deal of attention. Over de Linden died in 1875.

Overskov, o'vẹr-skov', (THOMAS,) a Danish dramatist, born at Copenhagen in 1798. He produced numerous comedies and operas; also a "History of the Danish Theatre," (1854–56.) Died November 7, 1873.

O'vẹr-stone, (SAMUEL JONES LOYD,) first BARON, an English banker, born in London in 1796. He was raised to the peerage in 1850. He had previously gained some distinction as a financier. He died November 17, 1883.

Overweg, o'vẹr-ŵĕg', (ADOLF,) a German traveller, born at Hamburg in 1822. He was associated with Mr. Richardson and Dr. Barth in a journey of exploration to Lake Tchad, in Africa. They left Tripoli in March, 1850, and Overweg, with Dr. Barth, reached Lake Tchad in 1851. He launched a boat on the lake and visited the islands in it. He died of fever at Kuka, in Central Africa, in September, 1852.

Ov'id, [Lat. OVID'IUS; It. OVIDIO, o-vee'de-o; Fr. OVIDE, o'vĕd',] or, more fully, Pub'lius Ovid'ius Na'so, a popular Roman poet, was born at Sulmo, (Sulmona,) about ninety miles east of Rome, in 43 B.C. He studied rhetoric in Rome under Arellius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and made himself master of Greek at Athens. His poetical genius was manifested in early youth, and afterwards diverted him from the practice of law, which, in compliance with his father's will, he began to study. He held, however, several civil or judicial offices at Rome, and became one of the Decemviri. He sought and obtained the acquaintance of Propertius, Horace, Macer, and other poets. He also enjoyed for a time the favour of the emperor Augustus. Among his earliest productions were three books of "Amores." Before the age of fifty he had published "The Art of Love," ("Ars Amatoria,") "Medea," a tragedy, and "Heroic Epistles," ("Heroides.") He had also nearly finished his celebrated "Metamorphoses," ("Metamorphoseon Libri XV.,") which display great poetical genius. In the year 8 A.D. he was suddenly banished by Augustus to Tomi, on the Euxine, near the mouth of the Danube. The reason assigned for this penal measure was the publication of his immodest poem "The Art of Love;" but this is believed to have been a mere pretext, as that poem was published about ten years earlier. Ovid in his later writings alludes to some offence which he mysteriously conceals, and for which he admitted that he deserved to suffer. This question appears to have baffled the ingenuity and curiosity of scholars. He has been censured for the abject terms in which he petitioned Augustus for a pardon, which was inexorably refused. He died at Tomi in 18 A.D., which was also the year of Livy's death. His "Medea," which some ancient critics esteemed his most perfect work, is lost. During his exile he wrote, besides other minor poems, "Twelve Books of Fasti," ("Fastorum Libri XII.,") six of which have come down to us. This is a poetical Roman calendar, and has historical value as well as literary merit. Ovid was thrice married, and divorced his first wife and his second. He also loved and courted a woman of high rank, whom he celebrated under the fictitious name of Corinna. Some writers suppose she was Julia the daughter, or Julia the granddaughter, of the emperor Augustus. The best English translation of Ovid is "Ovid's Metamorphoses, in Fifteen Books, translated by the Most Eminent Hands," London, 1717. Among these translators were Dryden, Addison, Congreve, and Garth.

Oviedo, de, dā o-ve-ā'DO, (ANDRES,) a Spanish Jesuit and missionary, born at Ilhescas. He was sent to Abyssinia about 1556. Died in 1577.

Oviedo y Valdes, de, dā o-ve-ā'DO e vāl-dēs', (GONSALO FERNANDEZ,) a celebrated Spanish historian, born at Madrid in 1478, became at an early age one of the pages at the court of Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1513 he visited the West Indies, where he resided many years, and obtained, among other important offices, that of historiographer of the Indies. His principal work is entitled "General History of the West Indies," (1st vol., 1535,) which, though containing many errors, displays extensive learning and has been of great value to subsequent historians. The last volume of it remains in manuscript. He also published a "Treatise on the Natural History of the Indies," and wrote a valuable work, which is still in manuscript, entitled "Quinquagenas," or Fifty Dialogues. Died in 1557.

Ovington, ŭv'ing-tọn, ? (JOHN,) an English ecclesiastic and traveller, was chaplain to King James II. In 1689 he sailed to the East Indies, and spent several years in Surat. He published in 1698 his "Voyage to Surat in the Years 1689–93," etc., which was translated into French.

Owen. See GORONWY-OWEN.

O'wẹn, (DAVID DALE,) brother of Robert Dale, noticed below, was born in Lanarkshire, Scotland, in 1807. In 1848 he was appointed to conduct the geological survey of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota. The result of his observations was published in a quarto volume, with maps and illustrations, (1852.) He was appointed in 1857 State geologist of Arkansas. Died in 1860.

O'wẹn, (GEORGE,) an English physician, born in Worcestershire, took his degree in 1527. He became physician to Henry VIII. Died in 1558.

Owen, (JEAN A.,) an English author, born in Staffordshire in 1841. She lived five years in New Zealand and travelled widely. She published several works of travel, fiction, etc., some of them being "After Shipwreck," (1882,) "Forest, Field, and Fell," (1892,) "The Story of Hawaii," (1898.)

Owen, [Lat. AUDOE'NUS,] (JOHN,) one of the best Latin poets of modern times, was born in Caernarvonshire, in Wales, about 1560. His "Epigrammata," published in 1612, are remarkable for elegance and correctness of language and caustic wit. They have been translated into several languages. Died in 1622.

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Owen, (JOHN,) an excellent English nonconformist divine and Puritan, born at Stadham, in Oxfordshire, in 1616, was a son of Henry Owen, a minister. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, which he quitted about 1637. After that date he was chaplain to Sir Philip Dormer and to Lord Lovelace. He became a resident of London in 1641 or 1642, and published his "Display of Arminianism," (1642.) In the civil war he was a constant adherent of the popular cause. He married early, was presented to the living of Coggeshall about 1644, and united himself in fellowship with the Independents. He published "Salus Electorum, Sanguis Jesu; or the Death of Death in the Death of Christ." In January, 1649, he preached a sermon before the House of Commons on the day after the execution of Charles I. This sermon was characterized by a more liberal and tolerant spirit than that which prevailed in his time. He was appointed chaplain to Cromwell in 1649, and Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1651. He was vice-chancellor of the University of Oxford about five years, 1652–56. In 1655 he wrote a work against Socinianism, called "Vindiciæ Evangelicæ." After the restoration of 1660, Owen preached in London for a number of years, and wrote many works, among which are an "Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews," (1668,) a "Discourse on the Holy Spirit," (1674,) and "The Doctrine of Justification," (1677.) Died in 1683.

Owen, (JOHN,) an English divine, born in London about 1765. He was one of the earliest members, and the principal secretary during his lifetime, of the Bible Society. He wrote, among other treatises, "The Christian Monitor for the Last Days," and a "Vindication of the Bible Society." Died in 1822.

Owen, (LEWIS,) a Welsh theologian, born in Merionethshire in 1572. He wrote a book against the Jesuits, "Speculum Jesuiticum," (1629.)

Owen, (RICHARD,) an English zoologist, anatomist, and palæontologist of great eminence, was born at Lancaster in 1804. He studied medicine, and entered the University of Edinburgh in 1824. In 1825 he became a pupil of John Abernethy, at Saint Bartholomew's Hospital, London. Through the influence of Abernethy he was appointed assistant curator of the Hunterian Museum of the College of Surgeons. He expended immense labour in the production of a catalogue of this collection, and succeeded Clift as curator of the museum. He published an excellent "Memoir on the Pearly Nautilus, (Nautilus Pompilius,)" (1832,) and a "Descriptive and Illustrated Catalogue of the Physiological Series of Comparative Anatomy in the Hunterian Museum," (5 vols., 1833–40.) He married in 1835 a daughter of Mr. Clift, above mentioned. About 1836 he succeeded Sir Charles Bell as Hunterian professor at the Royal College of Surgeons, and gave a series of lectures on comparative anatomy, which were published in 1843. He contributed numerous treatises or monographs on physiology and anatomy to the "Transactions of the Zoological Society" and the "Cyclopædia of Anatomy and Physiology." Professor Owen rendered important services to palæontology, and exhibited remarkable skill in the anatomy and reconstruction of extinct animals, such as the Cheirotherium, the Glyptodon, Mylodon, and Plesiosaurus. He discovered a gigantic fossil bird, the Dinornis. Among his chief works are "Odontography," (2 vols., 1840,) a "History of British Fossil Mammals and Birds," (1846,) and "On the Archetype and Homologies of the Vertebrate Skeleton," (1848.) He received the royal medal in 1848, and the Copley medal of the Royal Society in 1851. In 1856 he ceased to be Hunterian professor, and became director of the natural history departments of the British Museum. He was one of the eight foreign associates of the French Institute. In addition to the works above named, he published a treatise "On the Nature of Limbs," (1849,) "On Parthenogenesis," (1849,) and "On the Anatomy of Vertebrates," (3 vols., 1866–68.) In 1876 was published by the trustees of the British Museum his work "On the Fossil Reptilia of South Africa," with 70 plates, and in 1877 appeared his work "On the Fossil Mammals of Australia, and on the Extinct Marsupials of England," (2 vols., with 132 plates.) He was one of the first who used the microscope in the investigation of the structure of animals, and was the first who employed the word "homology" or "homologue" in comparative anatomy. He admitted the mutability of species, but opposed the Darwinian theory of Natural Selection, for which he substituted his "hypothesis of Derivation." He says, "Every species changes, in time, by virtue of inherent tendencies thereto. 'Natural Selection' holds that no such change can take place without the influence of altered external circumstances educing or selecting such change." ("On the Anatomy of Vertebrates," 3d vol. chap. xl.) He was considered by Humboldt the greatest anatomist of his age. Died December 18, 1892.

Owen, (RICHARD,) scientist, was born near New Lanark, Scotland, in 1810, son of the following. He settled with his father in the communistic town of New Harmony, Indiana, took part in the Mexican and civil wars, and became a professor of natural science in the University of Indiana. He made important researches in meteorology and magnetism. Died in 1890.

Owen, (ROBERT,) a socialist and philanthropist, born at Newton, in Wales, in 1771, was a son of poor parents. He married about 1800 a daughter of David Dale, who owned cotton-mills at New Lanark, on the Clyde. Owen managed these mills for a time with success, and gave much attention to the comfort of the operatives and the education of their children. He published in 1812 a "New View of Society," and afterwards "The Book of the New Moral World," in which he advocated a modified system of community of property. About 1824 he purchased a large tract at New Harmony, Indiana, and there tested by experiment his socialist theory, which was entirely unsuccessful. He returned to England in 1827, and continued to propagate his projects of reform by lectures and writings. His doctrines were adopted by a large number of people, who were called Owenites. Died in 1858.

Oxenstiern, oks'ẹn-stẹrn', or Oxenstierna, oks'ẹn-shĕr'nȧ, (AXEL,) COUNT, chancellor of Sweden, and one of the greatest statesmen of the seventeenth century or of modern times, was born at Fanö, in Upland, June 16, 1583. He was educated at Jena and Wittenberg. At the age of twenty-six he was chosen a senator, after having been employed in important negotiations. In 1611 Gustavus Adolphus appointed him chancellor of Sweden, or prime minister. The prudence, zeal, and profound combinations of Oxenstiern contributed greatly to the success of the Swedish hero. After Gustavus was killed, in 1632, the chancellor was invested with full power by the senate, and prosecuted the war against the Emperor of Germany. He was recognized as the head of the Protestant league, which gained several victories under his direction. During the minority of Queen Christina he governed Sweden with ability, restored the finances to good order, and patronized learning. He was prime minister after Christina began to reign, (1645,) and strenuously opposed her abdication. He died in August, 1654. Oxenstiern was the author of the often-quoted observation, addressed to his son, "You do not know, my son, with how little wisdom the world is governed," ("Nescis, mi fili, quantillâ prudentiâ homines regantur.") He was the reputed author of the second volume of "Historia Belli Sueco-Germanici," ("History of the Swedish-German War,") of which Chemnitz wrote the first volume. He was considered an equal match for Richelieu in diplomacy. He had two sons, John and Erik, who obtained high offices in the public service.

Oxenstiern, (BENEDICT,) an able Swedish statesman, of the same family as the preceding, was born in 1623. He was appointed governor of Warsaw by Charles X., after whose death (1660) he returned to Sweden and had great influence in the government. About 1672 he obtained the confidence of Charles XI., who appointed him chancellor and chief minister. The pacific system of Oxenstiern was disturbed by the death of Charles XI., in 1697. After Charles XII. had defeated the Danes and conquered Poland, Oxenstiern advised him to make peace, in a memoir which is called a master-piece of wisdom. Died in 1702.

See SCHLÖZER, "Schwedische Biographie."

Oxenstiern, (ERIK,) a son of the celebrated statesman, was born in 1624. He became a senator in 1652, and vice-chancellor in 1654, soon after which he conducted negotiations with the Elector of Brandenburg. Died in 1656.

Oxenstiern, (JOHAN,) a brother of the preceding, was born at Stockholm in 1611. He entered the army, and obtained the rank of colonel. About 1639 he was raised to the dignity of senator. He was employed for several years as minister-plenipotentiary in Germany, and represented Sweden in the negotiations which resulted in the peace of Westphalia, (1648.) Died at Weimar in 1657.

Paez, pā-ĕs', (FRANCESCO ALVAREZ,) a Portuguese monk, asserted the temporal power of the pope in a treatise "De Planctu Ecclesiæ." Died in 1532.

Paez, pā-ĕth', (FRANCISCO,) a Jesuit missionary, born at Olmedo, in Spain, in 1564. He entered Abyssinia in 1603, learned a native dialect, and converted the king, Za-Denghel. He is said to have visited one of the sources of the Nile in 1618. He died in Abyssinia in 1622, (as is supposed,) leaving a History of Abyssinia in manuscript, and some letters.

Paez, pā-ĕth', (JOSÉ ANTONIO,) a South American general, born at Varinas about 1785. He served with distinction in the army of Bolivar against the Spaniards. The victory at the great battle of Carabobo, or Carabolo, in 1821, is ascribed to him. In 1830 he was elected President of Venezuela for four years. He was re-elected in 1838 or 1839, and was appointed dictator in 1846. Having failed in an armed contest with Monagas in 1848, he was taken prisoner and exiled in 1850. He was Venezuelan minister to the United States in 1860 and 1861. Died in New York, May 6, 1873.

See his Autobiography, "Autobiografia del José Antonio Pzez," 1867; "North American Review" for July, 1827.

Pagan, de, deh pă'gŏN', (BLAISE FRANÇOIS,) COUNT, an eminent French engineer and geometer, was born at Avignon in 1604. He distinguished himself by skill and courage in the war against the French Protestants, and directed the siege of Nancy, in 1633. He had just been made a maréchal-de-camp, in 1642, when he was deprived of sight by disease. Continuing to apply himself with success to mathematics, he gained a high reputation by his writings. In 1645 he published in his "Treatise on Fortifications" ("Traité des Fortifications") a new system of fortification, which quickly superseded all others. He is reputed one of the greatest masters and improvers of the art on which that work treats. Died in 1665.

See PERRAULT, "Hommes illustres."

Paganel, pă'gă'nĕl', (CAMILLE PIERRE ALEXIS,) a littérateur, born in Paris in 1797. He was elected to the Chamber of Deputies six times between 1834 and 1846, and voted with the Centre. Among his works is a "History of Frederick the Great," (1830.) Died in 1859.

Paganel, (PIERRE,) a French politician, the father of the preceding, was born at Villeneuve d'Agen in 1745. He was a moderate member of the Convention in 1792–95. He voted, however, for the death and reprieve of the king. He wrote an "Essay on the French Revolution," (3 vols., 1810.) Died in 1826.

Pagani, pă-gă'nee, (FRANCESCO,) a Florentine painter, born in 1531. He painted frescos in his native city. Died in 1561.

Pagani, (GREGORIO,) a son of the preceding, was born at Florence in 1558. He was a pupil of Cigoli, whose style he imitated, was an excellent colorist, and was one of the best masters that Florence possessed at the end of the sixteenth century. His master-piece, "The Discovery of the Cross," was destroyed by fire. His extant works are not numerous. Died in 1605.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Pagani, (PAOLO,) a painter, born in the duchy of Milan in 1661. He worked in Venice with success. The gallery of Dresden contains his picture of a Magdalene in meditation. Died in 1716.

Pagani-Cesa, pă-gă'nee chā'să, (GIUSEPPE URBANO,) an Italian poet, born at Belluno in 1757. He wrote "La Villegiatura di Clizia," (1802,) and other poems of some merit. He also produced a mediocre version of Virgil's "Æneid," (1822.) Died in 1835.

Paganini, pă-gă-nee'nee, (NICCOLÒ,) a celebrated Italian performer on the violin, was born at Genoa in 1784. He received lessons from Rolla, Ghiretti, and Paer, and is said to have composed a sonata of merit at the age of nine, about which time he began to perform in public concerts, and by his wonderful powers produced the most extraordinary excitement among the audience. When not yet fifteen, he escaped from the control of his father, and commenced business on his own account. But, unhappily, the admiration and flatteries which he received, and the control of large sums of money, which he procured almost without effort, exerted a most injurious effect on his moral character, and he fell into habits of gambling and into the practice of other vices. About 1802 he retired for a time from public view; but his former habits of life, and the necessity of excitement, soon induced or compelled him to return. After he had given concerts in the great cities of Italy, he visited Vienna in 1828, and was received with the wildest enthusiasm. His performances created a furor wholly unparalleled in the history of music. He gained enormous sums of money in Paris and London. His marvellous performance on a single string excited especial astonishment. He composed sonatas, etc. for the violin, which display an inventive genius. Died at Nice in 1840. With all his rare gifts, he is said to have been sensual, extremely avaricious, and excessively vain.

Pahlen, von der, fon dĕr pä'lẹn, (PETER,) BARON or COUNT, a Russian general, born about 1744. He gained the favour of the Czar Paul, who appointed him Governor-General of Saint Petersburg. He took an active part in the assassination of Paul, in 1801, and is said to have been the chief of that conspiracy. He retired to his estate in Livonia, where he died in 1826.

Pahlen, von der, (PETER,) COUNT, a Russian general, and son of the preceding, distinguished himself in the campaigns of 1812 and 1813. He was ambassador to Paris from 1835 to 1842. Died April 1, 1864.

Paice. See PACE, (RICHARD.)

Pailleron, pä'yeh'rôn', (EDOUARD,) a French poet and dramatic author, born in Paris in 1834. His earlier works,—"Le dernier Quartier," (1863,) "Le second Mouvement," (1865,) etc.,—marked by elegance of diction, were less successful than his later, poorer, and more sensational plays,—"Faux Ménages," (1860.) etc.,—many of which are enlivened by brilliant wit. Died in 1899.

Paillet, pä'yä', (ALPHONSE GABRIEL VICTOR,) an eminent French advocate, born at Soissons in 1795, settled in Paris about 1826, and acquired a very high reputation for eloquence and probity. He displayed consummate art in the statement and exposition of facts. In 1849 he was elected to the Legislative Assembly. Died in 1855. "Nature had given him," says the "Biographie Universelle," "in a just measure and in perfect equilibrium, all the qualities which are requisite to form a great advocate."

See, also, J. LARNAC, "Éloge de M. Paillet," 1857.

Pailliet, pā'ye-ā', or Paillet, pā'yā', (JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH,) a French jurist, born at Orléans in 1789. He published a "Manual of French Law," (9th edition, 1836,) which was perhaps more popular than any other similar book. He also wrote other works. Died about 1860.

Paine, (ELIJAH,) LL.D., an American jurist, born at Brooklyn, Connecticut, in 1757. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1794, and in 1801 became judge of the United States court for Vermont. He was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of other learned institutions. Died in 1842.

Paine, (ELIJAH,) son of the preceding, was born at Williamstown, Vermont, in 1796, and rose to eminence as a jurist. He published, in conjunction with John Duer, "Practice in Civil Actions and Proceedings in the State of New York," (1830.) Died in 1853.

Paine, (JOHN KNOWLES,) an American musical composer, born at Portland, Maine, January 9, 1839. He finished his musical education at Berlin. In 1862 he was appointed instructor of music at Harvard, and in 1876 was raised to a full professorship there. He has produced "Saint Peter," an oratorio, the "Centennial Hymn," for the exposition of 1876, "Columbus March" and hymn for Chicago Exposition, (1892,) etc. He published "Famous Composers and their Works," (1892–94.)

Paine, (MARTYN,) M.D., LL.D., an eminent physician, was born at Williamstown, Vermont, in 1794, and graduated at Harvard College in 1813. He afterwards settled in New York, where he gained a high reputation and extensive practice. In 1841 he was one of the founders of the University Medical College, in which he filled the chair of therapeutics and materia medica. He published, among other works, "The Cholera Asphyxia of New York," "Medical and Physiological Commentaries," (1840,) and "Institutes of Medicine," (1847.) The two last-named have a very high reputation. He wrote a treatise on "Theoretical Geology." Died in New York city, November 10, 1877.

Paine, (ROBERT TREAT,) an American jurist and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born at Boston in 1731. He was a member of Congress for about four years, (1774–78.) In 1780 he was one of the committee which formed the State Constitution of Massachusetts, and in 1790 became judge of the supreme court of that State. Died in 1814.

See GOODRICH, "Lives of the Signers to the Declaration of Independence."

Paine, (ROBERT TREAT,) a son of the preceding, was born at Taunton, Massachusetts, in 1773. He graduated at Harvard College in 1792, and, having subsequently studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1802. He was the author of a very popular political song, entitled "Adams and Liberty," and of other works, in prose and verse. Died in 1811.

See R. W. GRISWOLD, "Poets and Poetry of America," p. 75

Paine, (THOMAS,) a political and deistical writer, born at Thetford, in Norfolk, England, in January, 1737. His father was a Quaker, and brought up his son to his own trade, that of stay-maker. Paine married young, and settled in 1759 at Sandwich. Having lost his wife about 1761, he removed to London, where for a short time he was employed as a school-teacher. After several changes of business and residence, he emigrated to America in 1774, with a letter of recommendation from Dr. Franklin, whom he met in London. He became editor of the "Pennsylvania Magazine," and gave an impulse to the Revolution by his famous pamphlet called "Common Sense," in which he advocated the policy of separation and independence. It was issued in January, 1776, and appears to have contributed in an extraordinary degree to the advancement of republican ideas. He enlisted as a volunteer in the army in the autumn of 1776. To counteract the depression of spirits which prevailed in the winter of 1776–77, he published "The Crisis," a periodical, which appeared at irregular intervals for some years and was very successful. The phrase "These are the times that try men's souls" was first used in the "Crisis." He was secretary to the committee on foreign affairs in Congress from April, 1777, to January, 1779, and went to France in 1781, with Colonel Laurens, to negotiate a loan for the United States. His services in the Revolution were rewarded by Congress in 1785 with a present of three thousand dollars, and the State of New York gave him three hundred acres of land.

In 1787 he visited France, from which he passed to England. He invented an iron bridge, and procured the construction of such a bridge at Rotherham, in Yorkshire. He returned to Paris in 1789, and, in answer to Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution," wrote his "Rights of Man," (1791,) which obtained great popularity. In September, 1792, he was elected a member of the French National Convention by the citizens of the Pas-de-Calais. He acted with the Girondists, and, in the trial of the king, voted for his banishment. About the end of 1793 he was expelled from the Convention, as a foreigner, by the Jacobins, who also issued a decree that all natives of England found in France should be imprisoned. He was accordingly cast into prison, and narrowly escaped death in the reign of terror. In November, 1794, he was released, through the influence of James Monroe, (afterwards President of the United States,) and resumed his seat in the Convention. He produced in 1795 a deistical work entitled "The Age of Reason," which gave great offence to many of his political friends. This work, although characterized by a certain vigour as well as flippancy of style, and though from its very indecency calculated to obtain currency among the less refined portion of society, yet, being conspicuously wanting in a spirit of candour, and betraying an utter deficiency in true scholarship, is likely to exert but little influence upon intelligent and reflecting minds, and least of all on those whose learning qualifies them to judge of the ignorance of the writer and the essential shallowness of most of his arguments. He returned to the United States in 1802, and passed his latter years in private life and comparative obscurity. He became intemperate in the latter part of his life. Died in New York in June, 1809.

Paine, (WILLIAM H.,) an American civil engineer, born at Chester, New Hampshire, in 1828. He went to California in 1848, surveyed a wagon route over the Rocky Mountains in 1849 and a railroad route over the Sierra Nevada in 1853. Subsequently he became an engineer on the Brooklyn Bridge and a builder of cable roads. He had just completed one in Cleveland, Ohio, at his death in 1890.

Paisiello, pī-se-el'lo, or Paesiello, pā-ā-se-el'lo, (GIOVANNI,) a celebrated Italian composer, born at Tarento in 1741, studied five years under Durante at Naples. About 1764 he produced operas entitled "La Pupilla" and "Il Mondo alla Rovescio," which extended his reputation throughout Italy. He was chapel-master to the King of Naples from 1786 to 1798. Having been invited by Bonaparte, he went to Paris in 1802, and officiated as chapel-master for two years. He returned to Naples in 1804. Among his popular operas are "King Theodore," ("Il Re Teodoro,") "The Barber of Seville," "Frascatina," "La Locanda," "Pirro," and "Io son Lindoro," (or "Hope told a Flattering Tale.") "He is superior to his rivals," says Denne-Baron, "in the suavity of his melody and the charm of his expression." His works display verve, originality, an extreme fertility of invention, and a grace and elegance which are almost unequalled. Died in 1816.

Paitoni, pī-to'nee, (GIACOMO MARIA,) an Italian monk and bibliographer, born at Venice about 1710. His reputation is founded on an accurate work entitled "Library of Ancient Latin and Greek Authors," etc., ("Biblioteca degli Autori antichi Greci e Latini volgarizzati," 5 vols., 1767.) Died in 1774.

Paixhans, pāks'ąnz or pąk'sŏN', (HENRI JOSEPH,) a French general, born at Metz in 1783. He served in the campaigns of Austria and Prussia, and at the battle of Moskwa, (1812.) He represented Metz in the Chamber of Deputies many years, ending in 1848, and rose to the rank of general of division. He made improvements in artillery and projectiles, which bear his name, and published several works on artillery and the art of war. The Paixhan guns were first used in France about 1824. Died in 1854.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale:" "Foreign Quarterly Review" for June, 1828.

Pajol, pą'zhol', (CLAUDE PIERRE,) COMTE, a French general, born at Besançon in 1772. He signalized himself at Ulm and Austerlitz, (1805,) was made a general of brigade in 1807, and became a general of division in 1812. His defence of Montereau was praised by Napoleon, who appointed him grand officer of the legion of honour in 1814. He fought against Charles X., and was second in command of the Parisian troops in July, 1830. Died in 1844.

Pajon, pą'zhŏN', (CLAUDE,) a French Protestant minister, born at Romorantin in 1626. He preached at Orléans, and gained a high reputation by his writings, among which is a defence of the Protestant faith against Nicole, entitled "Examen des Préjugés légitimes," (de Nicole,) (1675.) Died in 1685.

Pajot, pą'zho', (LOUIS LÉON,) Comte d'Ons-en-Bray, (dŏN sŏN brą̄,) a French mechanician and collector, born in Paris in 1678. He collected a rich cabinet of machines and rare works of art, etc. He invented an anemometer, and wrote several scientific treatises. In 1708 he became director-general of the post-office. Died in 1754.

Pajou, pą'zhoo', (AUGUSTIN,) a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1730, was a pupil of Lemoyne. He gained the grand prize in 1748, and went as royal pensioner to Rome, where he remained twelve years. He enjoyed great celebrity in France in his time. Among his works are statues of Pascal, Descartes, Fénelon, Turenne, and Bossuet. Died at Paris in 1809.

See LEBRETON, "Notice historique sur la Vie de M. Pajou," 1810; Biographie Universelle."

Pajou, (JACQUES AUGUSTIN,) a historical painter, a son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1766; died in 1828.

Pakenham, pā'ken-am, (Sir EDWARD,) a British general, who commanded the army which attacked New Orleans and was defeated by General Jackson, January 8, 1815. He was killed in this action. He was a brother-in-law of the Duke of Wellington.

Pakenham, (Sir THOMAS,) a British admiral, born in 1758. As captain of a ship of seventy-four guns, he took part in Lord Howe's victory over the French in June, 1794. He became admiral about 1810. Died in 1836.

Pakht, pąkt, Pasht, or Sekhet', a goddess of the ancient Egyptians, the wife of Phthah, and mother of Imhotep. She is often confounded with BAST, (q. v.,) but seems to have been properly distinct from that goddess, though some regard them as representations of a being with a twofold nature. Bast was worshipped at Bubastis, Pakht chiefly at Memphis.

Pā'king-ton, (DOROTHY,) a learned English lady, was a daughter of Lord Coventry, and wife of Sir John Pakington. Died in 1679. She was supposed to be the author of "The Whole Duty of Man."

Pakington, (Sir JOHN SOMERSET,) an English conservative politician, a son of William Russell, of Powick Court, Worcestershire, was born in 1799. He assumed the name of his uncle about 1830. He entered Parliament in 1837, and was colonial secretary for a short time in 1852. He was first lord of the admiralty in 1858–59, and was appointed secretary of war in 1867, but resigned in the following year. Died April 9, 1880.

Palacky, pą̊-lą̊ts'kee, sometimes Anglicized in pronunciation as pą̊-lak'kee, (FRANCIS,) an eminent Bohemian historian and critic, born at Hodslawitz in June, 1798, was a Protestant. He was appointed historiographer of Bohemia about 1830, and edited the "Journal of the Bohemian Museum" from 1827 to 1837. He was an active supporter of liberal principles in 1848, and presided over a Congress of Slavonians at Prague in that year. His principal work is an excellent "History of Bohemia," in German, (8 vols., 1836–60.) Died in 1876.

Paladines. See PALLADINES.

Paladini, pą̊-lą̊-dee'nee, (ARCANGELA,) a painter and poetess, born at Pisa in 1599; died in 1622.

Paladini, (FILIPPO,) an able Florentine painter, born about 1544, was the father of the preceding. His picture of the "Death of John the Baptist" is admired. Died in 1614.

Palæmon, pą-lee'mon, [Gr. Παλαίμων; Fr. PALÉMON, pą̈'lą'mŏN',] in the Greek mythology, the son of Athamas and Ino, was first called MELICERTA. He was regarded as a marine divinity, and the Isthmian games were instituted in his honour. He was identified with the Roman Portumnus. (See MELICERTA.)

Palæmon, pą-lee'mon, (QUINTUS REMMIUS,) a Roman grammarian, who lived in the time of Tiberius, about 45 A.D.

Palæologus, pā-le-ol'o-gus, [Gr. Παλαιολόγος; Fr. PALÉOLOGUE, pą̈'lą'o'log',] the name of an illustrious Byzantine family which acquired distinction in the eleventh century. They reigned in Constantinople from 1260 until 1453, when that capital was taken by the Turks. (See ANDRONICUS II., CONSTANTINE XIII., MANUEL II., JOHN VI., and JOHN VII.)

Palæphatus, pą-lēf'ą-tus, a Greek historian of Abydos, was a friend of Aristotle, and lived about 350 B.C. According to Suidas, he wrote on Attica, Arabia, and Cyprus.

Palæphatus, a Greek writer of an uncertain period, to whom Suidas attributes an "Explanation of Things related in Mythology." By some critics this is identified with an extant work "On Things Incredible," (περὶ των ἀπίστων.) Suidas also mentions an Athenian epic poet of this name, who lived before Homer.

Palafox, de, dą̊ pą̊-lą̊-fŏH', (JUAN,) a Spanish bishop and writer, born in Aragon in 1600. He became Bishop of Osma in 1653. He wrote, besides works of devotion, "The Shepherd of Christmas Eve," ("Pastor de Noche Buena," 1655,) and "The Conquest of China by the Tartars," (1678.) Died in 1659.

See DINOUART, "Vie de J. de Palafox," 1767; CHAMPION, "Histoire de J. de Palafox," 1688.

Palafox y Melzi, pą̊-lą̊-fŏH' e mel'*th*ee, (JOSÉ,) commonly called simply PALAFOX, (which in pronunciation is usually Anglicized as pąl'ą-foks',) a Spanish general, born in Aragon in 1780. He became in his youth a member of the military household of the king. When an attack on Saragossa by the French was expected, in 1808, he was nominated captain-general by popular acclamation. He defended that city obstinately for sixty days, at the end of which term the French retired, August, 1808. Another force, under Lannes, renewed the siege in November, and Palafox was forced to capitulate in February, 1809. He supported the popular cause against Ferdinand VII. in 1820. About 1836 he was made Duke of Saragossa. Died in 1847.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Pal'ą-mas, [Παλαμᾶς,] (GREGORIUS,) a Greek monk and mystical writer, lived about 1350. He was the leader of a sect or party called Palamites, whose claims to mystical light caused a great controversy.

Palamède. See PALAMEDES.

Pal-a-me'dēs, [Gr. Παλαμήδης; Fr. PALAMÈDE, pą̈'lą'mą̊d',] a personage of classic mythology, supposed to have been the inventor of scales, measures, chess, dice, and several letters of the Greek alphabet. Having joined the expedition against Troy, he exposed by an ingenious stratagem the feigned insanity of Ulysses, and thereby incurred his enmity. The poets relate that Ulysses concealed in the tent of Palamedes a sum of money and a forged letter from Priam, on the evidence of which Palamedes was convicted of treason and put to death.

See VIRGIL, "Æneid," book ii. 82.

Palaprat, pȧ'lȧ'prȧ', (JEAN DE BIGOT,) a French dramatic poet, born at Toulouse in 1650. He was secretary to the grand prior of Vendôme, and was noted for wit. He wrote dramas entitled "The Secret Revealed" and "The Prude of the Time," ("La Prude du Temps,") and assisted Brueys in the composition of several plays. Died in 1721.

Păl-ą-tī'nus, a surname given by the Romans to Apollo, to whom a temple was erected on Mount Palatine.

Palazzi, pȧ-lȧt'see, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian historian, born at Venice about 1640. He wrote many mediocre works, among which is a "History of the German Empire," (9 vols., 1671–79.) Died about 1702.

Paleario. See PALEARIUS.

Păl-e-ā'rĭ-us or Paleario, pȧ-lȧ-ȧ're-o, (AONIUS or AONIO,) a good Italian writer and scholar, was born in the Campagna of Rome about 1500. His proper name was DELLA PAGLIA, (pȧl'yȧ.) He acquired distinction as a Latin poet, and became professor of eloquence at Milan in 1555. His Latin poem on the immortality of the soul (1536) was commended by Sadolet. Having been converted to the doctrines of the Reformers, or advocated religious liberty, he was tried for heresy and hung at Rome in 1570.

Paleotti, pȧ-lȧ-ot'tee, (GABRIEL,) an Italian cardinal, born at Bologna in 1524. He was sent to the Council of Trent by Pius IV., and became a cardinal in 1565. Among his works is "De Bono Senectutis," (1598.) Died in 1597.

Pā'lēs, [Fr. PALÈS, pȧ'lĕs',] a divinity who presided over cattle, shepherds, and pastures among the ancient Romans. Pales was represented by some as a male and by others as a female deity, and was the personification of the same idea as Pan among the Greeks.

Palestrina, da, dȧ pȧ-lĕs-tree'nȧ, (GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI,) an Italian composer of great celebrity, was born at Palestrina, (the ancient Præneste,) near Rome, about 1524. He studied at Rome under Claude Goudimel, a Frenchman. In 1551 he was appointed chapel-master to Pope Julius III. He produced in 1554 his first work, four masses for four voices, and obtained a place among the singers of the pontifical chapel, from which Paul IV. removed him because he was married. From 1561 to 1571 he was chapel-master of Santa Maria Maggiore. During this period the pope resolved to reform the music of the Church or to banish it. Palestrina was directed to compose a mass which should be conformed to a pure orthodox standard. The result was the famous mass for six voices, called the "Mass of Pope Marcellus," (1565,) which was received with great admiration and determined his superiors to retain music in the Roman Church. "The unrivalled genius of Palestrina," says Denne-Baron, referring to this mass, "created the only kind of music which comports with the majesty of the Church; and among the productions of succeeding composers nothing has equalled the power, the profound and simple accent, the mystic tenderness, the ravishing sweetness, of his chants." ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.") In 1571 he was appointed chapel-master in Saint Peter's. Died in 1594.

See WINTERFELD, "J. Pierluigi von Palestrina," etc., 1832.

Paletta, pȧ-lĕt'tȧ, or Palletta, pȧl-lĕt'tȧ, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) an Italian anatomist and writer, born in the valley of Ossola, in Piedmont, in 1747. He became surgeon-in-chief of the grand hospital of Milan in 1787. Among his works is "Pathological Exercises." ("Exercitationes Pathologicæ," 2 vols., 1820.) Died in 1832.

See G. FERRARIO, "Vita del Professore G. B. Paletta," 1833.

Pā'ley, (FREDERICK APTHORP,) an English scholar, a grandson of the distinguished William Paley, was born at Easingwold in 1816, and graduated in 1838 at Saint John's College, Cambridge. In 1846 he became a Roman Catholic, and in 1874 was appointed a professor of classical literature in the University College at Kensington. Besides editing many Greek and some Latin texts, he published a "Manual of Gothic Architecture," (1846,) and other writings, chiefly on church architecture and kindred subjects. Died in 1888.

Paley, (WILLIAM,) an eminent English writer, born at Peterborough in 1743. He graduated in 1763 at Christ's College, Cambridge,—where he does not appear to have been distinguished for his application,*—took holy orders, and was chosen a Fellow of his college in 1766. He was subsequently employed as a tutor at Cambridge, and became rector of Musgrove, in Westmoreland, in 1775, soon after which date he married. In 1782 he was appointed Archdeacon of Carlisle. He published in 1785 "The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy," regarded by some as the most important of all his works. As a writer he excels in logical power and in clearness of style. He denies the existence of a moral sense, and adopts the maxim that "whatever is expedient is right." He was liberal in theology, was a friend of civil and religious liberty, and earnestly advocated the abolition of the slave-trade. In 1790 he produced an admirable work entitled "Horæ Paulinæ, or the Truth of the Scripture History of Saint Paul evinced." He was appointed a prebendary of Saint Paul's in 1794, and was presented to the sub-deanery of Lincoln Cathedral. About 1795 he obtained the rectory of Bishop-Wearmouth. His other principal works are "A View of the Evidences of Christianity," (3 vols., 1794,) one of the best works ever written on the subject of which it treats, and "Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity," (1802,) which has a very high reputation and has often been reprinted. Paley's utilitarianism and alleged laxity of view respecting certain questions in morals, and in a no less degree his liberalism in politics, were distasteful to George III., who refused positively to appoint him to the episcopate, on his nomination by the prime minister. Died May 25, 1805,

"This excellent writer," says Mackintosh, "who, after Clarke and Butler, ought to be ranked among the brightest ornaments of the English Church in the eighteenth century, is in the history of philosophy naturally placed after Tucker, to whom, with praiseworthy liberality, he owns his extensive obligations. . . . His style is as near perfection in its kind as any in our language. . . . The most original and ingenious of his writings is the 'Horæ Paulinæ.' 'The Evidences of Christianity' are formed out of an admirable translation of Butler's 'Analogy' and a most skilful abridgment of Lardner's 'Credibility of the Gospel History.' . . . His 'Natural Theology' is the wonderful work of a man who after sixty had studied anatomy in order to write it;† and it

* It is said that during the early part of his term at Cambridge he spent his time in agreeable idleness. One of his companions called on him early one morning, and told him he had been unable to sleep, from the convictioo that he (Paley) was squanderiog talents which, if properly directed, might be most useful to himself and to the world, concluding with these words: "If you persist lo your indolence, I must renounce your society." The result was that Paley entirely changed his course of life.

† We do oot attach any very great importaoce to the charge of "stupeodous plagiarism" brought against Paley for what he has borrowed from Dr. Nieuwentyt. (See the article oo this subject in the "London Athenæum," published in August, 1848.) Macaulay well remarks that "the reasoning by which Socrates, in Xenophon's hearing, confuted the little atheist Aristodemus is exactly the reasoning of Paley's 'Natural Theology.'" (See article on "Ranke's History of the Popes," in Macaulay's "Essays.") If, then, Paley's line of argument is exactly like that of Socrates, and also the same as that employed by Dr. Nieuwentyt, it is at least possible that Dr. Nieuwentyt may have derived some of his ideas and arguments—if not his could only have been surpassed by a man who to great originality of conception and clearness of exposition added the advantage of a high place in the first class of physiologists. . . . It cannot be denied that Paley was sometimes rather a lax moralist,—especially on public duties." (See Mackintosh's "Progress of Ethical Philosophy.")

"On one great topic—that of Christian evidence—he has shed new light. By felicity of arrangement and illustration, he has given an air of novelty to old arguments, whilst he has strengthened his cause by important original proofs. His 'Horæ Paulinæ' is one of the few books destined to live. Paley saw what he did see through an atmosphere of light. He seized on the strong points of his subject with an intuitive sagacity, and has given his clear bright thoughts in a style which has made them the property of his readers almost as perfectly as they were his own. . . . He was characterized by the distinctness of his vision. He was not, we think, equally remarkable for its extent. He was popular rather than philosophical. He was deficient in that intellectual thirst which is a chief element of the philosophical spirit. He had no irrepressible desire to sound the depths of his own nature, or to ascend to wide and all-reconciling views of the works and ways of God. Moral philosophy he carried backward; nor had he higher claims in religious than in ethical science. His sermons are worthy of all praise, not, indeed, for their power over the heart, but for their plain and strong expositions of duty and their awakening appeals to the conscience." Pal'frey, (John Gorham,) LL.D., an American divine and historian, born at Boston in 1796. Having graduated in 1815 at Harvard College, he studied theology, and was appointed in 1831 Dexter professor of sacred literature at Harvard. He became in 1836 editor of the "North American Review." He published "Lectures on the Jewish Scriptures and Antiquities," (4 vols., 1838–52,) "Evidences of Christianity," (1843,) "Review of Lord Mahon's History of England," (1852,) and "The Relation between Judaism and Christianity," (1854.) He was elected in 1847 to Congress, where he distinguished himself as an advocate of emancipation, having previously liberated a number of slaves bequeathed to him by a relative in New Orleans. In 1851 he became associate editor of "The Commonwealth," a leading journal of the Free-Soil party. In 1859 et seq. appeared his "History of New England during the Stuart Dynasty," (4 vols.,) followed by an abridgment of the same. Died at Cambridge, Massachusetts, April 25, 1881. His daughter, Sara H., born in 1823, was the author of several volumes of poems and a number of novels.

Palfrey, (William,) an American patriot, born at Boston in 1741. He took an active part in the movements which preceded the Revolution, and visited England in 1771. In March, 1776, he became an aide-de-camp to General Washington. He was appointed paymaster-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, in April, 1776. Having been appointed consul-general in France by a unanimous vote of Congress in November, 1780, he embarked in a ship which was never heard of after she left the Capes.

Pálfy, pâl'fe, (Albert,) a Hungarian littérateur and publicist, born at Grosswardein in 1813. Soon after the commencement of the republican movement in 1848, he founded a daily paper called "The 15th of March," which obtained great popularity and had a marked influence on the Hungarian revolution. In 1849 the journal was confiscated, and its editor for a time imprisoned. Pálfy is the author of several novels, which rank among the best in Hungarian literature.

Pálfy, (János,) Count of, a Hungarian field-marshal, born in 1659, served under Prince Eugene in the Italian campaigns of 1701–2, and subsequently against the Turks. He was appointed in 1741 commander-general in Hungary, where he was a zealous adherent of Maria Theresa. Died in 1751.

Palfyn, pâl-fĭn', sometimes written Palfin, (Jean,) a skilful Flemish anatomist, born at Ghent in 1650. He lectured on surgery at Ghent, made some improvements in that art, and published a valuable work on "Surgical Anatomy," (1710.) Died in 1730.

See De Mersseman, "Notice sur J. Palfyn," 1844.

Pal'grave, (Sir Francis,) F.R.S., an English historian, born in London in 1788. His family name was Cohen, which he exchanged for that of Palgrave. In 1827 he was admitted to the bar. He published in the "Family Library," in 1831, "The History of England: Anglo-Saxon Period," and in 1832 "The Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth: Anglo-Saxon Period," (2 vols.,) which were received with favour. A few years later he was appointed deputy keeper of her Majesty's public records. Among his principal works is a "History of Normandy and England," (1st vol., 1851; 2d vol., 1857.) Died in July, 1861.

Palgrave, (Francis Turner,) LL.D., an English poet, eldest son of Sir Francis Palgrave, was born in London, September 28, 1824. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and at Balliol College, Oxford, and was professor of poetry at Oxford 1886–95. He published "Idylls and Songs," (1854,) "Essays on Art," (1866,) "Life of Sir Walter Scott," (1867,) "Landscape in Poetry," (1897,) etc. He edited the well-known "Palgrave's Golden Treasury," an excellent compilation of English lyrics. Died in 1897.

Palgrave, (William Gifford,) an English author, a son of Sir F. Palgrave, was born at Westminster, January 24, 1826, and was educated at the Charterhouse, and at Trinity College, Oxford, graduating B.A. in 1846. After serving in the Bengal army for a time, he became a Jesuit and a priest. In this capacity he was for many years a missionary in the Levant. In 1862–63 he traversed a large part of Arabia, in the service of the Jesuits and of the emperor Napoleon III. He afterwards (1865) entered the British consular service, and was sent to many parts of the world. In 1880 he became British consul-general at Bangkok, Siam, and in 1884 British minister to Uruguay. Among his works are "Lectures on the Massacres of the Christians in Syria," (1861,) "Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia," (2 vols., 1865, a work of rare value,) "Essays on Eastern Questions," (1872,) "Hermann Agha," (a novel, 1872,) a well-written work on "Dutch Guiana," (1876,) etc. Died September 30, 1888.

Palice. See Chabannes, de, (Jacques.)

Palice, de la, dĕh lä pä'lĕss', (Jacques de Chabannes—dĕh shä'băn',) Seigneur, an able French general, whom Charles VIII. appointed lieutenant of the kingdom of Naples about 1498. He was wounded at Agnadel in 1509. When Nemours fell at Ravenna, in 1512, the army demanded La Palice for their general. He was defeated at Guinegâte in 1513, obtained a marshal's bâton in 1515, and served under Lautrec in the Milanese in 1521. In 1523 he opposed Constable Bourbon with success in Provence. He was killed at Pavia in 1525.

Palikao, de, dĕh pä'lē'kä'ō', (Charles Guillaume Marie Apollinaire Antoine Cousin-Montauban,) Count, a French general, born in Paris, June 24, 1796. He entered the army very young, and in 1855 became a division-general. The victory he won with the Anglo-French army at Palikao, in China, (September 21, 1860,) gave him his title. In the early part of the German war of 1870 he became prime minister and war minister, but after the battle of Sedan he fled the country. Died January 8, 1878.

particular illustrations—from Socrates. We should be very sorry to say anything to encourage plagiarism; but those who are best acquainted with what has been done in this department of philosophy will probably be most ready to admit the impossibility of any one claiming justly absolute originality, or anything near it, in this great field of thought. The chief merit of Paley, who does not appear to have made any especial pretension to originality as respects the individual ideas or illustrations of his subject, coosists in the admirable skill and ability with which he combines and presents the whole argument. Without being the creator, or eveo the first discoverer, of many of the different points of evideoce adduced by bim, he may be said to marshal them as a consummate general marshals bis forces, so as to render them in combination irresistible.

Pal-I-nū'rus, [Gr. Παλινοῦρος; Fr. PALINURE, pȧ'le'-nür',] the pilot or helmsman of the ship which carried Æneas in his sea-voyage.

Pal'isa, (J.,) an astronomer, born at Troppau, Silesia, in 1848. He devoted his attention to the minor planets, very many of which he discovered.

Palliser, (Sir WILLIAM,) a British soldier and inventor, born in Dublin, June 18, 1830. He served in the army from 1855 to 1871, and invented field-guns, projectiles for piercing the iron armour of forts and ships, etc. He was knighted in 1873. Died February 4, 1882.

Palisot de Beauvois, pȧ'le'zo' dẹh bō'vwȧ', (AMBROISE MARIE FRANÇOIS JOSEPH,) a French botanist and zoologist, born at Arras in 1752. He explored Benin and a part of Guinea in 1786–87, after which he visited Saint Domingo. Escaping from the revolted slaves, who were about to kill him, he took refuge in Philadelphia in 1793, after which he made a scientific excursion in the interior. He returned to France in 1798, and succeeded Adanson in the Institute in 1806. He published a "Flora of Owara and Benin," (2 vols., 1804–21,) "Insects collected in Africa and America," (1805–21,) and other works. His "Flora of Owara," etc. is described by Depping as "a beautiful work, rich in discoveries." Died in 1820.

Palissot, pȧ'le'so', (CHARLES DE Montenoy—mon'-tẹh-nwȧ',) a French poet and prose writer, born at Nancy in 1730. A caustic and satirical temper involved him deeply in literary quarrels, especially against the Encyclopedists. He ridiculed Rousseau in his comedy entitled "The Circle," ("Le Cercle," 1755,) and Diderot in "Little Letters on Great Philosophers," ("Petites Lettres sur de grands Philosophes," 1757.) His comedy of "The Philosophers" ("Les Philosophes," 1760) was very successful; but his satirical poem the "Dunciade" (1764) was a failure. Died in 1814.

Pȧl'ĭs-sy, [Fr. pron. pȧ'le'se',] (BERNARD,) a celebrated French potter and enameller, born near Agen (Lot-et-Garonne) about 1506. He studied natural history, chemistry, and other sciences. He expended many years in experiments on the art of enamelling stoneware or pottery, and, after great trials and sufferings, at last succeeded, in 1555. During this period he was converted to the Reformed religion, for which he was arrested and imprisoned. About 1565 he was invited to Paris, employed by the king, and lodged at the Tuileries. By the favour of his noble or royal patrons, he escaped the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, in 1572. In 1575 he opened a course of lectures on physics and natural history at Paris. He was the first in France who applied sound methods and demonstrations in explaining the phenomena of nature. He ornamented his ware, called rustiques figulines, with accurate coloured figures of animals. Among his works is a "Treatise on the Origin of Fountains, and on the Nature of Metals, Salts, Stones," etc., (1580.) He died in 1589, in the Bastille, where he was confined for his religious principles. He was distinguished no less for his virtue than for his talents.

Palladio, pȧl-lȧ'de-o, [Lat. PALLA'DIUS,] (ANDREA,) an illustrious architect, born at Vicenza, in Italy, in 1518. It is not known who was his master; but he states in one of his works that he chose Vitruvius as his guide in architecture. He found a liberal patron in Trissino the poet, and visited Rome several times to study the monuments of antiquity. Having settled in Vicenza, he exhibited his superior talents in the design of the Palazzo della Ragione. He adorned his native city with many private residences or villas, and built on the Brenta the Foscari palace, which was much admired. The Villa Capra, or Rotonda, near Vicenza, and the Teatro Olimpico, in that city, are considered among his masterpieces. He built several fine edifices in Venice, among which is the church of Il Redentore, begun about 1577. In 1570 he published a "Treatise on Architecture," which was often reprinted. He died in 1580. "He combines," says Castellan, "in the style of his edifices, simplicity and grandeur. . . . He seems to have derived from the ancients the quintessence of their taste." ("Biographie Universelle.") It is, however, proper to observe that while perhaps no other architect has enjoyed a higher or more universal reputation for genius and taste, so that the term "Palladian" has been extensively used throughout Europe as equivalent to beautiful and excellent in architecture, his designs, in the opinion of many critics, are very far from being faultless. For some severe strictures on the style of Palladio, the reader is referred to the article on "Architecture," by Professor Hosking, in the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Pal-lā'dĭ-us, [Παλλάδιος,] surnamed IATROSOPHIS'TA, a Greek medical writer of an uncertain epoch. As he quotes Galen, he must have lived after 200 A.D. He left a short treatise on Fevers, (περὶ πυρετῶν σύντομος σύνοψις,) and scholia on Hippocrates' book on Fractures. Both of these are extant.

Palladius, Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia, is supposed to have flourished about 400 A.D. He wrote a work, in Greek, called the "Lausiac History," which contains biographies of some ascetics or saints of Palestine and Egypt.

Palladius, [Fr. PALLADE, pȧ'lȧd',] a bishop, who was sent by Pope Celestine to convert the Irish or Scotch (Scotos) about 431 A.D. He is honoured as a saint both by the Irish and the Scottish Romanists.

Palladius OF METHONE, a Greek Sophist, lived about 325 A.D. He wrote on the Festivals of the Romans.

Palladius, (RUTILIUS TAURUS ÆMILIANUS,) a Roman writer on agriculture, lived probably between 300 and 400 A.D. His work "On Agriculture" ("De Re Rustica") was popular in the middle ages, and is still extant.

Pallajuolo. See POLLAJUOLO.

Pal'las, [Gr. Παλλάς,] an appellation of the goddess Minerva or Athena. (See MINERVA.) In Homer this name always appears united with Athena, as Pallas Athena.

Pal'las, a favourite of the Roman emperor Claudius, was a slave in his youth. He was an accomplice of Agrippina in the crime of poisoning Claudius. Died in 63 A.D.

Pallas, a son of Evander, King of Arcadia, was an ally of Æneas in the war against Turnus. He was renowned for his courage, and was an intimate friend of Æneas. He was killed by Turnus.

See VIRGIL'S "Æneid," book viii. 104, x. 365–489.

Pallas, a son of Pandi'on, King of Athens and a brother of Ægeus. He was said to have been killed by Theseus.

Pallas, pȧl'lȧs, (PETER SIMON,) a distinguished Prussian naturalist and traveller, born in Berlin in 1741. He was educated for the medical profession at Göttingen and Leyden, and made himself master of Latin, French, and English. He acquired reputation by his "Miscellanea Zoologica," (1766,) and at the invitation of Catherine II. he became professor of natural history in the Academy of Saint Petersburg in 1767. He wrote for the Academy a "Memoir on the Fossil Bones of the Huge Quadrupeds found in Siberia." Pallas was one of the many scientific men whom the empress sent in 1768 to explore Siberia. He devoted his attention in this great enterprise to zoology, botany, and geology, and, after extending his researches to the frontier of China, returned to Saint Petersburg in 1774. His "Travels through Different Provinces of the Russian Empire" (in German, 1771–76) is highly esteemed for its exact descriptions and just observations. He discovered in the mountain-ranges of Siberia the general law of the succession of the three primitive orders of rocks,—the granitic, the schistose, and the calcareous. "This great fact," says Cuvier, "expressed in his Memoir read to the Academy in 1777, has given birth to all modern geology." He displayed his superior genius in many other works, among which are a "History of the Mongolian Nations," "Essays on the North in Relation to Physical Geography, Ethnography," etc., (1781–96,) and "Flora Rossica," (a "Flora of Russia," 1785.) In 1795 he removed for his health to the Crimea, the climate of which had appeared pleasant to him as he formerly passed through it. Although he was disappointed by finding the climate extremely variable, he remained there about fifteen years, after which he removed to Berlin, where he died in 1811. He left unfinished a great work on the Zoology of the Russian Empire, of which 3 vols. were published, entitled "Fauna Asiatico-Rossica." He was a foreign associate of the French Institute.

Pallavicini, pål-lå-ve-chee'nee, or Pelavicino, på-lå-ve-chee'no, (OBERTO,) MARQUIS, an able general, born at Piacenza. He became the ally of the emperor Frederick against Gregory IX. in 1234, after which he gained victories over the Guelphs and made himself master of a large part of Northern Italy. His power was subverted by Charles of Anjou in 1266. Died in 1269.

Pallavicini or Pallavicino, pål-lå-ve-chee'no, (PIETRO SFORZA,) an Italian historian and cardinal, was born at Rome in 1607. He wrote a treatise on style, "Dello Stilo," (1662,) and other works, the best-known of which is a "History of the Council of Trent," (2 vols., 1656, and 3 vols., 1664.) It is said to be well written. Died in 1667.

See IRENEO AFFO, "Memorie della Vita del Cardinale S. Pallavicino," 1794; TIRABOSCHI, "Storia della Letteratura Italiana."

Pallavicini, (STEFANO BENEDETTO,) an Italian poet, born at Padua in 1672. He became a resident of Dresden in his youth. He produced several original poems, and a version of the Odes of Horace, (1736,) which is elegant, but rather free. Died at Dresden in 1742.

Pallavicini della Priola, pål-lå-ve-chee'nee del'lå pree'o-lå, (EMILIO,) MARQUIS, an Italian general, born at Ceva in 1823. He distinguished himself in the war against Austria in 1859. He commanded the force which captured Garibaldi at Aspromonte in August, 1862.

Pallavicino. See PALLAVICINI.

Pallavicino, pål-lå-ve-chee'no, (FERRANTE,) an Italian monk and satirical writer, born at Piacenza about 1618. He wrote licentious works, and satires against Pope Urban VIII. and the Barberini. Having imprudently entered the papal territory, he was seized and beheaded at Avignon in 1644.

Pallière, på'le-air', (VINCENT LÉON,) a French historical painter, born at Bordeaux in 1787. He gained the first prize at Paris in 1812, and went to Rome, with a pension. Among his works is "Homer dictating his Poems." He died prematurely in 1820.

Palma, pål'må, (JACOPO,) styled IL VECCHIO, (èl vĕk' ke-o,) or THE ELDER, an eminent painter of the Venetian school, born near Bérgamo. His birth is variously dated from about 1480 to 1520. He is said to have been a pupil of Titian. He excelled in vivacity and softness of colouring. The galleries of Europe contain a great many works attributed to him. Among his master-pieces are a "Last Supper" and a Madonna at Vicenza. His works exhibit good taste in composition, and such a union of tints that no trace of the brush is perceptible. Died at the age of forty-eight.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters;" RODOLFI, "Vite degli Illustri Pittori Veneti;" LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Palma, (JACOPO,) THE YOUNGER, a nephew of the preceding, was born at Venice in 1544. He imitated Titian and Tintoretto, and acquired a high reputation. In the opinion of some writers, he combined the best principles of the Roman and Venetian schools. "The distinctive mark of his talent," says the "Biographie Universelle," "is facility. His tints are fresh and transparent, and more agreeable than those of Tintoretto." He is charged, however, with depraving the style of the Venetian school. Among his works are an "Annunciation" and "The Plague of the Serpents." Died in 1628.

See VASARI, "Lives of the Painters;" LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Palmaroli, pål-må-ro'lee, (PIETRO,) an Italian painter, distinguished for his skill in transferring frescos to canvas. He practised this art first with success in 1811. He transferred and restored many pictures of the old masters in Rome. Died in 1828.

Palmblad, pålm'blåd, (WILHELM FREDRIK,) a Swedish editor and writer, born near Söderköping in 1788. He edited several literary periodicals, one of which was the "Phosphorus," and became a member of a new school, called Phosphorists, who preferred German literature and influence to the French. He was professor of history and of the Greek language at Upsal. His chief production is a "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Swedes," (23 vols.,) a work of much merit, commenced about 1835 and finished in 1857. He wrote a successful novel, called "Aurora Königsmark," (6 vols., 1846–51.) Died in 1852.

See "Biographiskt-Lexicon öfver namnkunnige Svenska Män."

Palmegiani, pål-må-jå'nee, or Palmezzano, pålmĕt-så'no, (MARCO,) an able Italian painter, born at Forlì in the fifteenth century. His works are dated from 1513 to 1537.

Palmella, pål-mel'lå, (PEDRO DE Souza-Holstein —sō'zå ol-stān', ?) DUKE OF, a liberal Portuguese statesman, born at Turin in 1786. He was appointed minister of foreign affairs and president of the council by John VI. of Portugal in 1823. He was an adherent of Don Pedro in his contest against Don Miguel, (1830–33.) After the accession of Queen Maria (1834) he became prime minister. Died in 1850.

Palmer, på'mẹr, (ALONZO BENJAMIN,) M.D., LL.D. an American physician, born at Richfield, New York October 6, 1815. He studied medicine in the New Yorl

College of Physicians and Surgeons, graduating in 1839. He afterwards studied in Philadelphia, in New York, and in Europe. In 1850 he removed to Chicago, and in 1852 became professor in the University of Michigan, in which he held the chair of anatomy, (1852–54,) and that of materia medica and therapeutics, (1854–60,) and that of pathology and practice after 1860, besides for several years holding professorships in other medical schools. His principal work is "The Science and Practice of Medicine," (2 vols., 1882.) He also published a polemic on "Homœopathy," (1880; 2d edition, 1882,) and many professional papers and pamphlets. Died, Dec. 23, 1887.

Palmer, (BENJAMIN MORGAN,) D.D., LL.D., an American Presbyterian divine, born at Charleston, South Carolina, January 25, 1818. He graduated at the University of Georgia in 1838, and was for some time professor of ecclesiastical history in the theological seminary at Columbia, South Carolina. He published a "Life of Dr. Thornwell," "The Family in its Civil and Churchly Aspects," two volumes of sermons, etc.

Pal'mer, (CHRISTIAN DAVID FRIEDRICH,) a German Protestant divine and pulpit orator, born at Winnenden, Würtemberg, January 27, 1811. He studied at Tübingen, and was in 1851 appointed professor of practical theology there. He published "Evangelical Homiletics," "Catechetics," "Pædagogics," "Pastoral Theology," and other works. Died at Tübingen, May 29, 1875.

Palmer, (EDWARD HENRY,) an accomplished English linguist, born in Cambridge, August 7, 1840. After his graduation at Cambridge in 1867 he travelled extensively in the East. He became Arabic professor at Cambridge in 1871, and in 1882 was sent as British agent to restrain the tribes of North-Western Arabia during the war with Arabi Pasha in Egypt. He was killed by the Arabs in August, 1882. Palmer was a man of vast attainments, and had the finest natural gifts. Among his books are "The Negah, or South Country of Scripture," (1871,) "The Desert of the Exodus," (1871,) and various poetical translations into and from the Persian, etc.

Palmer, pä'mer, (ERASTUS DOW,) a distinguished American sculptor, born in Onondaga county, New York, in 1817. Among his principal works are an "Indian Girl Contemplating a Crucifix," "The White Captive," the "Sleeping Peri," and the "Landing of the Pilgrims." He has also executed a number of portraits, busts, and bas-reliefs.

Palmer, (INNIS N.,) an American general, born in New York, graduated at West Point in 1846. He fought as brigadier-general in the Union army at Fair Oaks, and at Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862. He commanded in the district of North Carolina from April, 1864, to March, 1865. Died in 1900.

Palmer, (JAMES S.,) an American rear-admiral, born in New Jersey, entered the navy in 1825. He commanded the Iroquois in the passage of the batteries of Vicksburg, June, 1862, and was captain of Farragut's flagship when she ran past the batteries of Port Hudson, in March, 1863. Having gained the rank of commodore, he was appointed commander of the Western Gulf Blockading Squadron about the end of 1864. Died in December, 1867.

Palmer, (JOHN,) an English Unitarian minister, born in 1729, preached in London many years. Died in 1790.

Palmer, (JOHN MCAULEY,) an American general, born in Scott county, Kentucky, in 1817, was a lawyer before the civil war, and practised in Illinois. He was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers in December, 1861, and commanded a division at the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862–January 2, 1863. For his services in this action he was promoted to the rank of major-general. He took part in the battle of Chickamauga, September 19 and 20, 1863, and commanded a corps under Sherman in the campaign against Atlanta, May–September, 1864. He was elected Governor of Illinois by the Republicans in 1868, was United States Senator 1891–97, and presidential candidate of the gold-standard Democrats in 1896. Died in 1900.

Palmer, (JOHN WILLIAMSON,) an American author, born at Baltimore in 1825. He became a physician, travelled widely, and published "Up and Down the Irrawaddy," "After his Kind," (a novel,) "The Queen's Heart," (a comedy,) "Folk-Songs," etc.

Palmer, (PHEBE,) an American author, born in New York city, December 18, 1807. She married Dr. W. C. Palmer in 1827. She became a revivalist speaker of the Methodist denomination, and published "The Way of Holiness," "Faith and its Effects," "Four Years in the Old World," and other works. She wrote also various hymns, etc. Died in 1874.

Palmer, (RAY,) an American poet, born at Little Compton, Rhode Island, November 12, 1808, graduated at Yale College in 1830, and, having studied divinity in New Haven, was in 1835 ordained a Congregationalist minister. He has published various devotional and religious books, and several volumes of poems and hymns, of which some are widely popular. Among his books are "Spiritual Improvement," (1839; reissued as "Closet Hours," 1851,) "Remember Me," (1855,) "Complete Poetical Works," (1876,) "Voices of Hope and Gladness," (1880,) etc. [Died March 29, 1887.]

Palmer, (Sir ROUNDELL,) an eminent English lawyer and legislator, born at Mixbury, Oxfordshire, in 1812. He was called to the bar in 1837, elected to Parliament in 1847, and appointed solicitor-general in 1861. He was attorney-general from 1863 to June, 1866. He was returned to Parliament for Richmond in 1861, in 1865, and in 1868, and was one of the ablest debaters of the Liberal party. In 1872 he was appointed lord chancellor of England, and raised to the peerage as Baron Selborne of Selborne. In 1877 he was elected lord rector of St. Andrew's. Died May 4, 1895.

Palmer, (SAMUEL,) an English etcher and painter, born at Walworth, in Surrey, in 1805. He won success in oil- and water-colours, but his chief fame is derived from his etchings and illustrative drawings. D. in 1881.

Palmer, (WILLIAM,) an English divine, a brother of Lord Selborne, (see PALMER, ROUNDELL,) was born at Mixbury, July 12, 1811. In 1830 he graduated as B.A. at Magdalen College, Oxford, and became an Anglican priest, but in 1856 he joined the Romanists. He published various theological works. Died at Rome, April 5, 1879.

Palmer, (WILLIAM PITT,) an American poet, born at Stockbridge, Berkshire county, Massachusetts, in 1805. He passed a large part of his mature life in the city of New York, and was successively a medical student, a teacher, a writer for public journals, and a clerk in a public office. He wrote a hymn or ode entitled "Light," and other short poems. Died May 2, 1884.

Palmerston, pä'mer-stŏn, (HENRY JOHN TEMPLE,) VISCOUNT, an eminent English prime minister, born at Broadlands, near Romsey, in Hampshire, on the 20th of October, 1784. He was the eldest son of Henry Temple, second Viscount Palmerston, and was descended from an ancient family, of which the famous Sir William Temple was a member. He was educated at Harrow, Edinburgh, and Saint John's College, Cambridge. At the death of his father, in 1802, he succeeded to the estate and title of viscount, (in the Irish peerage.) He was elected a member of Parliament by the Tories in 1807, and was appointed a lord of the admiralty in the same year. He soon distinguished himself by his talents for business and his political tact. In 1809 he became secretary at war in the ministry of Percival, and in 1811 he was returned to Parliament for the University of Cambridge, which he continued to represent for about twenty years.

He retained the office of secretary at war during the long administration of Liverpool (1812–27) and under the ministries of Canning and Goderich. As an advocate of Catholic emancipation, he declined to serve under the Duke of Wellington, and resigned office in 1828. Before this date he had become an eminent debater, especially on foreign affairs, in respect to which he favoured the policy of Canning. Although he had hitherto been a Tory, he accepted office as secretary of foreign affairs in the Whig ministry formed in November, 1830. Having resigned with his colleagues in November, 1834, he was appointed to the same office in the Melbourne ministry in April, 1835, and held it until the accession of Sir Robert Peel, in September, 1841. During this term of official service he had a prominent part in the settlement of the Eastern question. He induced Russia, Austria, and Prussia to unite with England in a treaty signed in London in July, 1840, and to resist the progress of Mehemet Ali in Syria. France, which favoured Mehemet Ali, was thus ignored in the settlement of the question. He married about 1839 the first Lord Melbourne's daughter, who was the widow of Earl Cowper. On the formation of a new ministry by Lord John Russell, in 1846, Palmerston again became minister of foreign affairs. He pursued the policy of neutrality towards the revolutionary movements by which Europe was convulsed in 1848 and 1849, but he promptly recognized the French republic, and favoured Napoleon's coup d'état in 1851. In consequence of a disagreement with Lord John Russell, he was removed in December of that year. In December, 1852, Lord Aberdeen formed a coalition ministry, in which Palmerston was secretary for the home department, while the ministry "drifted" into war against Russia. He succeeded Lord Aberdeen as prime minister in February, 1855, and formed a cabinet chiefly of Whigs or Liberals. Peace was restored with Russia in March, 1856. Having been defeated in Parliament on the subject of the Chinese war in March, 1857, he appealed to the country, which sustained his policy by a large majority. He failed in his effort to pass the Conspiracy bill occasioned by Orsini's conspiracy against Napoleon III., and was compelled to resign in February, 1858. In June, 1859, he succeeded Lord Derby as the head of a ministry in which Russell was foreign secretary and Gladstone chancellor of the exchequer. He continued to be prime minister until his death, October 18, 1865. He had no children. Palmerston retained in his old age much of the vigour and vivacity of youth. He was an excellent master of parliamentary science and political tactics, and enjoyed a high degree of popularity. He represented Tiverton in the House of Commons from 1835 to his death.

Palomino de Castro y Velasco, pâ-lo-mee'no dā kās'tro e vā-lās'ko, (Don ACISLO ANTONIO,) a celebrated Spanish painter, born near Córdova in 1653. His name is sometimes written PALOMINO DE VELASCO. He was a pupil of Juan de Valdes Leal. Having painted the story of Psyche for Charles II., he obtained, at an early age, the title of painter to the king. His chief merits are correct design, beautiful colour, and excellence in perspective. "The Confession of Saint Peter" is called one of his best works. His reputation is chiefly founded on his treatise on painting, entitled "El Museo pictorico y Escala optica," (2 vols., 1715,) and his "Lives of Spanish Painters" contained in his "Parnaso Español pictorico," (1 vol., 1724.) Died at Madrid in 1726.

Palotta, pâ-lot'tâ, (MATTEO,) an Italian musician and composer, born at Palermo about 1680. In 1733 the emperor Charles VI. appointed him one of the court composers at Vienna, where he died in 1758.

Pālsgrave, (JOHN,) an English grammarian, born in London. He gave lessons in French to Mary, a sister of Henry VIII., in 1514, and published a French grammar, (1530.) This is the most ancient printed work on that subject of which we have any knowledge, according to Barbier, who praises his sagacity and taste. Died in 1554.

Palu, de la, deh lā pā'lü', [Lat. PALUDA'NUS,] (PIERRE,) a French Dominican monk, born at Varambon about 1280. He was appointed Patriarch of Jerusalem about 1330, and wrote several works on theology. Died in 1342.

Paludan-Müller, pâl'ōō-dān' mül'ler, (CASPAR PETER,) a Danish historian, a brother of Frederic, was born in 1805. He published several works on Danish history, and "Researches on Machiavel." Died in 1882.

Paludan-Müller, (FREDERIC,) a popular Danish poet, born in Fünen in 1809. He produced in 1832 "Cupid at Court," a comedy, and in 1833 a poem called "The Danseuse," ("Dandserinden,") which is much admired. His most remarkable work, perhaps, is "Adam Homo," (1841–49,) a humorous poem. He is commended for happy images, noble ideas, and force of sentiment, but is deficient in invention as a dramatist. Died 1876.

Paludanus. See PALU.

Paludanus, pâ-lü-dā'nus, (BERNARD Ten Broek—tĕn brook,) a Dutch philosopher and traveller, born at Steenwyk in 1550; died in 1633.

Paludanus, (JEAN VAN DEN BROEK,) a Flemish theologian, born at Malines in 1565. He was professor at Louvain, and author of several works. Died in 1630.

Pamard, pā'mār', (JEAN BAPTISTE ANTOINE,) a French surgeon, born at Avignon in 1763; died in 1827.

Pamèle, de, deh pā'mâl', [Lat. PAME'LIUS,] (JACQUES,) a Flemish priest, born at Bruges in 1536. He edited the works of Cyprian (1568) and Tertullian, (1579,) and wrote "Liturgica Latinorum," (1571.) Died in 1587.

Pamelius. See PAMÈLE.

Pam'me-nēs, [Παμμένης,] a Theban general, was a friend of Epaminondas. Philip of Macedon was in the custody of Pammenes while he was a hostage at Thebes. Pammenes commanded an army sent to Megalopolis in 352 B.C.

Pammenes, an Athenian orator and teacher of rhetoric, lived in the time of Cicero, who extols his eloquence in high terms.

Pam'phĭ-la, [Gr. Παμφίλη,] a Roman or Greek historian, lived in the reign of Nero. She wrote a historical work entitled ὑπομνήματα ἱστορικά, which was highly esteemed by some ancient critics. It is not extant.

Pamphile. See PAMPHILUS.

Pam'phĭ-lus, [Πάμφιλος,] one of the most eminent Greek painters, was a native of Amphipolis, and flourished between 390 and 350 B.C. He was the pupil of Eupompus, whom he succeeded as the master of the Sicyonian school of painting. As a teacher of art, he was probably surpassed by none of the ancients. His school was remarkable for the importance which the master attached to general learning and the great attention he paid to accuracy in drawing. Pliny says that he was the first artist who was well versed in all sciences, and that he thought geometry necessary to the perfection of his art. He excelled in composition, and in what Quintilian calls ratio, or proportion. Pliny mentions four of his works, among which was "Ulysses on his Raft." Apelles and Melanthius were his pupils.

Pamphilus, a grammarian of Alexandria, is supposed to have lived in the first century of our era. He was the author of a "Greek Lexicon."

Pamphilus, [Fr. PAMPHILE, pôN'fēl',] SAINT, an eminent martyr, born at Berytus, (Beyroot,) in Syria, about 245 A.D. He became presbyter of Cæsarea, in Palestine, where he founded a large and renowned public library. He was eminent for learning and piety. Having a high esteem for the works of Origen, he transcribed nearly all of them with his own hand. Pamphilus and Eusebius composed jointly an "Apology for Origen." He suffered martyrdom in the reign of Maximin, at Cæsarea, in 309 A.D. Eusebius testified his friendship and honour for him by adopting the name of PAMPHILI.

See SAINT JEROME, "De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis;" BARONIUS, "Annales."

Pan, [Gr. Πάν,] the god of flocks, shepherds, and pastures, in classic mythology, was said to be a son of Mercury, and was sometimes identified with the Roman Lupercus. He combined the form of a man with that of a goat, having horns and feet like the latter animal. He was fond of music and riotous noise, and was the inventor of the syrinx, the pastoral pipe or flute. The principal seat of his worship was Arcadia. He was regarded by some philosophers as the symbol of the universe; for Pan signifies "all." Panic terrors were ascribed to Pan, who sometimes appeared to travellers and surprised them with a sudden alarm. The Romans observed an annual festival, called Lupercalia, in honour of Pan, whose priests were styled Luperci.

Pan-do'ra, [Gr. Πανδώρα, from πᾶν, "every," and δῶρον, "gift;" Fr. PANDORE, pôN'doR',] the name given in the Greek mythology to the first woman, who was endowed by Minerva and Venus with every attractive quality,—whence her name, which signifies possessing "every gift." Jupiter gave her a beautiful box, which she was to present to the man who should marry her. She became the wife of Epimetheus, who opened the box, whereupon there issued from it the numerous evils that have since infested human life. Pandora closed the box in time to prevent the escape of Hope. According to one account, Pandora herself, prompted by curiosity, opened the box, though she had been forbidden to do so. Another legend tells us that Pandora's box contained various blessings, which escaped when she opened it, and could never be recovered,—Hope alone remaining in the casket.

Păr-ą-cel'sus, [Fr. PARACELSE, pȧ'rȧ'sĕlss',] (PHILIPPUS AUREOLUS THEOPHRASTUS BOMBASTUS von Hohenheim—fon ho'en-hīm',) a famous alchemist and charlatan, supposed to have been born at Einsiedeln, in Switzerland, in 1493. In his youth he acquired a proficiency in the jargon of alchemists, magicians, and quacks, whom he consulted in nearly every part of Europe. Having performed some famous cures, he was appointed professor of medicine at Bâle in 1526. He there burned the works of Galen, styled himself the monarch of medicine, and pretended to have discovered a medicine capable of prolonging life indefinitely, (called the Elixir of Life.) He became intemperate, and in 1527 or 1528 resumed a vagabond life. In his medical practice he introduced mercury and opium into general use. He died poor, at Saltzburg, in 1541. He had published but little in his lifetime. After his death many volumes ascribed to him appeared at various times between 1575 and 1658. His medical reputation is founded on the importance which he gave to pharmaceutical chemistry.

His dogmatic and fantastic pseudo-philosophy found many admirers, especially in Germany.

Paré, par′re, [Fr. pron. pȧ′rȧ′; Lat. PARÆ′US,] (AMBROISE,) an excellent French surgeon, born at Laval (Mayenne) in 1509, (or in 1517, according to some authorities,) is styled "the Father of French surgery." His parents were poor, and his education was defective. Having studied in Paris, he became a surgeon in the army in 1536, and surgeon-in-ordinary to Henry II. in 1552. He reformed the treatment of gun-shot wounds, which previously were cauterized with boiling oil, and substituted the ligature of arteries for cauterization. He served Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III., as chief surgeon. Brantôme says that during the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew the king sent for Paré (who was a Protestant) and kept him in his own room for safety. He wrote many professional works, which are highly esteemed. The best edition is that of Malgaigne, (3 vols., 1840.) Died in 1590.

Păr'is, [Gr. Πάρις; It. PARIDE, pȧ're-dȧ,] a son of Priam, a Trojan prince, was celebrated for his beauty, gallantry, accomplishments, and adventures. He was sometimes called ALEXANDER. According to poetical tradition, he seduced Helen, the wife of Menelaus, and thus provoked the Greeks to wage the war which ended in the destruction of Troy. The death of Achilles is ascribed by some poets to a shaft from the bow of Paris. The decision by which he awarded the prize of beauty to Venus, when Juno and Minerva were competitors, was a favourite theme of ancient writers, who relate the following story: All the gods and goddesses were invited to the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, except Discord, who threw among the guests a golden apple, on which was inscribed "For the most beautiful." Juno, Minerva, and Venus disputed for this apple, and referred the decision of their claims to Paris, who was then a shepherd on Mount Ida. To influence his judgment, Juno promised to give him power, Minerva martial glory, and Venus the most beautiful of women. He decided in favour of Venus, and received from her Helen as his reward.

He is an exponent of the most advanced ideas in education, and the author of several school geographies, etc.

Parker, (GILBERT,) a Canadian novelist, was born November 24, 1862, lectured on English at a Toronto college, and edited a newspaper in Sydney. Among his works are "When Valmond came to Pontiak," (1895,) and "The Seats of the Mighty," (1896.)

Par'ker, (HENRY W.,) an American poet, born at Danby, Tompkins county, New York, in 1825. He published a volume of "Poems," (1850,) and contributed to the "North American Review." In 1864–65 he studied the sciences at Harvard University, and was subsequently connected with Iowa College.

Parker, (Sir HYDE,) an English vice-admiral, served with distinction against the French and Spaniards, and in 1781 defeated the Dutch admiral Zoutman at Doggerbank. Being appointed in 1783 commander of the British fleet in the East Indies, he perished by shipwreck on the passage.

Parker, (ISAAC,) an American jurist, born at Boston in 1768, became chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts in 1814. He was distinguished as a scholar. Died in 1830.

Parker, (JOEL,) LL.D., an American lawyer, born at Jaffrey, New Hampshire, January 25, 1795. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1811. In 1838 he was made chief justice of the New Hampshire Supreme Court, and in 1848 was appointed a professor in the law-school of Harvard University. His published writings were mostly on the legal aspects of various political questions. Died at Cambridge, Massachusetts, August 17, 1875.

Parker, (JOEL,) D.D., an American Presbyterian divine, born at Bethel, Vermont, August 27, 1799. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1824, and held pastorates in New York city and elsewhere. He published eight volumes of religious and pastoral writings. Died in New York, May 2, 1873.

Parker, (JOEL,) LL.D., an American lawyer, born at Monmouth, New Jersey, November 24, 1816. He graduated at Princeton College in 1839, and was admitted to the bar in 1842. He was chosen Governor of New Jersey in 1862, and again in 1876, and was afterwards a judge in the State courts. Died January 2, 1888.

Parker, (JOHN HENRY,) an English archæologist, born in 1806. Among his works are "Glossary of Architecture," (1836,) "Introduction to the Study of Gothic Architecture," (1849,) and "Archæology of Rome," (9 vols., 1874–77,) the latter being the fruits of Mr. Parker's excavations at Rome. Died in January, 1884.

Parker, (JOSEPH,) an English divine, was born at Hexham-on-Tyne in 1830. He became minister of the City Temple, London. Among his works are "The People's Bible," (25 vols.,) "Springdale Abbey," "Christian Profiles in a Pagan Mirror," (1898,) "Paterson's Paris," (1898,) etc.

Parker, (LOUIS N.,) an English composer and dramatist, born at Calvados, France, in 1843. He was long director of music in Sherbourne School, and in 1898 was made Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music. He produced numerous musical compositions, and subsequently a large number of plays.

Parker, (MARTYN,) an English poet of the seventeenth century, only remembered as the author of a song, "Ye Gentlemen of England," (1630,) which suggested to Campbell his far nobler lyric, "Ye Mariners of England."

Parker, (MATTHEW,) a learned and meritorious English prelate, born at Norwich in 1504, was educated at Cambridge. He became dean of the College of Stoke Clare in 1535, chaplain to Henry VIII. in 1537, master of Bene't College in 1544, and Dean of Lincoln in 1552. On the accession of Queen Mary (1553) he was deprived of his benefices, because he was a Protestant, or because he was married. He was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury by Elizabeth in 1559. A revised version of the Bible (called the Bishops' Bible) was published under his direction in 1568. He presented many valuable manuscripts to his college at Cambridge. Died in 1575.

See J. STRYPE, "Life of Archbishop Parker," 1711; BURNET, "History of the Reformation;" W. F. HOOK, "Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury."

Parker, (Sir PETER,) an English admiral, born in 1716, served in the American war, and in 1782 took prisoner the French admiral De Grasse. He was created admiral of the fleet. Died in 1811.

Parker, (PETER,) an American missionary and physician, born at Framingham, Massachusetts, June 18, 1804. He graduated at Yale College in 1831, studied medicine and divinity, and in 1854 went to China as a missionary physician. His work in this capacity was of very great importance. In 1857 he returned to the United States. Died January 10, 1888.

Parker, (RICHARD,) an English sailor, born at Exeter, was the ringleader of a mutiny at the Nore in May, 1797. He blockaded the port of London, and received the title of admiral from the mutineers. He was hung in June, 1797.

Parker, (SAMUEL,) an English bishop, born at Northampton in 1640. He was appointed prebendary of Canterbury in 1672, and Bishop of Oxford in 1686. It appears that he received this preferment from James II. because he favoured the cause of popery and absolutism. He died in 1687, leaving several theological works, and memoirs of his own times, entitled "De Rebus sui Temporis Commentarius," (1726.)

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

Parker, (SAMUEL,) D.D., an American bishop, born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, August 17, 1744, graduated at Harvard College in 1764. In 1774 he was ordained a priest of the English Church. In 1804 he was consecrated Bishop of the diocese of Massachusetts, (Episcopalian.) Died December 6, 1804.

Parker, (THEODORE,) a distinguished American scholar and rationalistic theologian, was born at Lexington, Massachusetts, on the 24th of August, 1810. His education was begun on his father's farm, and there he continued to carry on his studies even after he had entered his name at Harvard in 1830. He appears to have visited Cambridge only for the purpose of participating in the examinations. Being a non-resident, he was not entitled to a degree; but subsequently (in 1840) the honorary title of A.M. was conferred upon him by the university. In 1834 he entered the theological school, in which he remained about two years. He first began to preach at Barnstable in 1836. In April of the following year he married Miss Lydia D. Cabot, and soon after was settled as Unitarian minister at West Roxbury. His views had previously been but little in advance of the average Unitarianism of the time; but his growing acquaintance with the German rationalists De Wette, Eichhorn, Paulus, Bauer, and others was not long in producing an important change in his theological opinions,—a change, we need scarcely say, which he was at no pains to conceal. His new doctrines gave great offence to some of the more conservative of the New England Unitarians; and after his discourse (preached at South Boston in 1841) on the "Transient and Permanent in Christianity," in which he assumed the absolute humanity of Christ, His inspiration differing in no essential respect from that of other men, the opposition to him became much more decided. This opposition was conspicuously manifested on the occasion of his exchanging pulpits with other Unitarian ministers, some of whom were severely censured by many of their brethren, who held that by such an interchange of courtesies they gave a direct sanction to the new heresies. Parker's translation of De Wette's "Introduction to the Old Testament" appeared in the early part of 1843; later in the same year he visited Europe, returning in the summer of 1844. Soon after his return he began to preach in Boston, at the Melodeon, where he was regularly installed in 1846. He was the principal editor of the "Massachusetts Quarterly," which was commenced in 1847 and continued three years. In addition to his duties as minister, and his laborious intellectual pursuits, which extended to almost every department of human knowledge, he gave numerous lectures on various subjects. But the question which seems to have enlisted most fully all the faculties of his ardent and powerful mind was Southern slavery, with its attendant iniquities and abominations. His health having become greatly impaired by his unceasing and intense activity, in February, 1859, he visited the island of Santa Cruz, in the West Indies, and in the following summer went to Europe, spending the winter of 1859–60 at Rome. He left Rome in April, 1860, and with difficulty reached Florence, where he died on the 10th of May. Of his extensive collection of books, he left the principal part, amounting to 11,190 volumes and 2500 pamphlets, to the Boston Public Library. A complete edition of his works, edited by Frances Power Cobbe, was published in London in 1863–65, in 12 vols.

Parker, (THOMAS,) Earl of Macclesfield, an English judge, born at Leek in 1666. He became lord chancellor in 1718. He was accused of selling some offices in the court of chancery, and of other corrupt practices, of which he was convicted in 1725, and was fined heavily. Died in 1732.

Parker, (WILLARD,) M.D., LL.D., a distinguished American physician and surgeon, born in Lyndeborough, New Hampshire, September 2, 1800. He graduated in arts at Harvard College in 1826, and in medicine in 1830. He held various professorships of anatomy, surgery, etc., in different colleges, but chiefly in New York city, where he attained a very extensive practice as a physician. Died in New York city in 1884.

Parker, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English admiral, born in Staffordshire in 1781, was a relative of Lord Macclesfield. He became a rear-admiral in 1830, and a lord of the admiralty in 1834. In 1841 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the operations against China. He took Chusan and Ning-po, entered the Yellow River or Blue River, and compelled the Chinese to sign the treaty of Nanking. He obtained the rank of admiral of the blue in 1851. Died in 1866.

Parker, (WILLIAM KITCHEN,) an English naturalist, born in Lincolnshire in 1823. He was self-taught in science, and in 1869 was appointed professor of comparative anatomy in the Royal College of Surgeons, where he published monographs on the skulls of several animals. He published also "Morphology of Skulls," (1877,) and "Mammalian Descent," (1884.) Died in 1890.

Parkes, (Sir HENRY,) an Australian statesman, born in Warwickshire, England, in 1815. He emigrated to New South Wales in 1839, and from 1856 till his death was a member of its parliament. In 1872 he was made premier of the colony, and held this high office four times afterwards, his last administration ending in 1891. He died in 1896.

Parkes, parks, (JOSEPH,) an English lawyer, born at Warwick in 1796. He published, besides other works, a "History of the Court of Chancery," (1828,) and "The Equity and Real Property Laws of the United States of North America," (1830.) He distinguished himself as an advocate of parliamentary reform previous to 1832. Died in 1865.

Parkes, (JOSIAH,) a civil engineer, a brother of the preceding, was born at Warwick in 1793. He published "Essays on the Philosophy and Art of Land Drainage," (1848,) a "Treatise on Climate, Soils," etc., and other works.

Park'hurst, (CHARLES HENRY,) an American Presbyterian clergyman, born at Framingham, Massachusetts, in 1842. In 1880 he became pastor of the Madison Square Church, New York, and in 1891 president of the Society for the Prevention of Crime. He became a power in New York by his trenchant criticism of police methods in dealing with crime, described in his work "Our Fight with Tammany."

Parkhurst, (JOHN,) an English linguist, born in Northamptonshire in 1728. He officiated without salary as curate at Catesby for many years. In 1762 he published a "Hebrew-and-English Lexicon without Points," which was highly esteemed. His "Greek-and-English Lexicon" (1769) was reprinted and extensively used. He also wrote "The Divinity and Pre-Existence of Jesus Christ demonstrated from Scripture," (1787.) Died in 1797.

Park'in-son, (JOHN,) a botanist and apothecary, born in London in 1567. He received from Charles I. the title of "Botanicus Regius Primarius." He published "Paradisus Terrestris, or a Garden of all Sorts of Pleasant Flowers," (1629,) with 109 figures, and "Theatrum Botanicum," (1640.) Died about 1650.

Park'man, (FRANCIS,) an American writer, born at Boston in 1823, graduated at Harvard College in 1844, passed a year in Europe, made a trip to the Rocky Mountains, and published "The California and Oregon Trail," (1849,) "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac," etc., (1851,) "The Old Régime in Canada," (1864,) "The Pioneers of France in the New World," (1865,) "The Jesuits in North America," (1866,) "The Discovery of the Great West," (1869,) "Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV.," (1878.) "Montcalm and Wolfe," (2 vols., 1884,) and "A Half-Century of Conflict," (2 vols., 1892.) Died November 8, 1893.

Parlatore, pär-lä-to'rā, (FILIPPO,) an Italian botanist, born at Palermo in 1816. He obtained a chair of botany at Florence in 1842. Among his works are a "Memoir on Organography, Vegetable Morphology," etc., (1841,) "Comparative Botany," (1843,) and "Travels in Northern Europe," (1844.) Died in Florence, September 24, 1877.

Parménide. See PARMENIDES.

Par-men'i-dēs, [Gr. Παρμενίδης; Fr. PARMÉNIDE, pär'mā'nēd',] a distinguished Greek philosopher of the Eleatic school, was born at Elea, in Italy. He is said to have been a disciple of Xenophanes. Plato informs us that Parmenides, at the age of sixty-five, visited Athens in company with Zeno, who was twenty-five years younger, and became acquainted with Socrates. The date of this event is supposed to have been about 450 B.C. He developed his philosophy in a didactic poem "On Nature," of which some fragments have come down to us. Plato speaks of him with veneration, and Aristotle preferred him to the other masters of the Eleatic school. Zeno of Elea was one of his disciples, among whom some writers also reckon Empedocles.

Par-me'ni-o, [Gr. Παρμενίων; Fr. PARMÉNION, pär'mā'ne'ôn',] an eminent Macedonian general, the son of Philotas, was born about 400 B.C. He enjoyed the highest place in the confidence of Philip as a councillor and general. Parmenio and Attalus commanded an army which Philip sent to invade Persia in 336. He rendered important services in Alexander's expedition against Persia, and appears to have been regarded as second in command to the king. He commanded the left wing at the battles of the Granicus and Issus, (333,) and of Arbela, (331.) His son, Philotas, was accused of complicity in a plot against the life of Alexander, and, though he was probably innocent, he was induced by torture to make a confession of guilt which implicated Parmenio, who was put to death in 330 B.C. His death is considered to have left one of the darkest stains on the character of Alexander.

Parmentier, pär'môn'te-ā', (ANTOINE AUGUSTIN,) an eminent French philanthropist and writer on rural economy, born at Montdidier in 1737. He became an apothecary of Paris, and distinguished himself by his efforts to promote the cultivation and use of the potato, against which the people were prejudiced. He wrote treatises on the potato, chestnut, and maize. In 1790 he published "Rural and Domestic Economy," (8 vols.) He was a member of the Institute. About 1803 he became inspector-general of health, (inspecteur-général du service de santé.) Died in 1813.

Parmentier, (JACQUES,) a French painter, born in Paris in 1658. He resided mostly in England, and was employed by William III. to adorn his palace at Loo. Among his works is "Diana and Endymion." Died in London in 1730.

Parmentier, (JEHAN,) a French navigator, born at Dieppe in 1494. He is reputed the first European who navigated to Brazil, and the first who explored the Indian Sea as far as Sumatra. He died at Sumatra in 1530.

Parmesan, Le. See MAZZOLA.

Parmigiano, Il. See MAZZOLA.

Par'nell, (CHARLES STEWART,) an Irish statesman, born at Avondale, county of Wicklow, in 1846, of a Protestant family. His mother was the daughter of the American admiral Charles Stewart. He was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, and in 1874 was chosen high sheriff of Wicklow. In 1875 he entered Parliament for Meath, and in 1880 for Cork. He was chosen president respectively of the Irish National Land League (1879) and of the National League (1884), and was for years the principal leader of the Home Rule movement, in the interest of which he visited America, where he raised a fund of $350,000. In 1881–82 he was imprisoned for sedition by Mr. Gladstone, who afterwards became an advocate of Home Rule. On his birthday in 1889 he was presented with the freedom of Edinburgh, an event which was speedily followed by a disgraceful divorce case in which he was co-respondent with a Mrs. O'Shea, whom he afterwards married. Died October 6, 1891.

Parnell, (HENRY BROOKE.) See CONGLETON, LORD.

Par'nell, (THOMAS,) a British poet, born in Dublin in 1679. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and was ordained a deacon in 1700. In 1705 he became Archdeacon of Clogher. He obtained the living of Finglass, near Dublin, in 1716, and died in July, 1717. Among his best poems are a "Hymn to Contentment," "The Hermit," a night-piece on "Death," and an "Allegory on Man." He wrote several essays in the "Spectator," and other works in prose.

See GOLDSMITH, "Life of Parnell," prefixed to Parnell's Poems; CAMPBELL, "Specimens of the British Poets."

Parny, de, deh pär'ne', (Évariste Désiré Desforges—dā'fōrzh',) Chevalier and Vicomte, a popular French poet, born in the Isle of Bourbon in 1753, was styled "the French Tibullus." He was educated in France, chose the military profession, and returned to his native island in 1773. A disappointed passion for a creole named Éléonore inspired his first and most graceful and natural poetical compositions, "Amatory Poems," ("Poésies érotiques," 1775,) which were received with great favour. He went to India as aide-de-camp to the governor-general in 1785, but returned to France in 1786 and resigned his commission. After the Revolution he served the public as clerk in one of the bureaux of the government. His later poems, "The War of the Gods," ("La Guerre des Dieux," 1799,) "Paradise Lost," and "Les Galanteries de la Bible," were generally censured for their impiety, and have little literary merit. He was admitted into the French Academy in 1803. Died in 1814.

See P. F. Tissot, "Notice sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de M. de Parny," 1826; Sainte-Beuve, "Portraits littéraires;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Parocchi, pā-rōk'kee, (Lucido Maria,) an Italian cardinal, born at Mantua, August 13, 1833. He became a bishop in 1871, and Archbishop of Bologna in 1877, and was made a cardinal-priest in the same year. He afterwards attained the dignity of cardinal-vicar of Rome.

Parodi, pā-ro'dee, (Domenico,) an eminent painter of history, born at Genoa in 1668, was also a sculptor. He imitated the styles of Tintoretto and Paul Veronese. His chief work is in the Negroni palace, Genoa. It represents "Hercules killing the Nemean Lion," and other fabulous subjects. A statue of Adonis, which he made for Prince Eugene, is admired. Died in 1740.

Parodi, (Filippo,) an able sculptor, born at Genoa about 1640, was the father of the preceding. His works may be seen at Genoa, Venice, and Lisbon. Died about 1708. His son Battista, born in 1674, was a distinguished painter and a brilliant colorist. Died in 1730.

Parodi, Madame, a celebrated Italian singer, born about 1830. She has performed with great applause in the principal cities of Europe and the United States.

Parolini, pā-ro-lee'nee, (Giacomo,) an Italian painter of history, born at Ferrara in 1663, was a pupil of Carlo Cignani. Died about 1735.

Paroy, de, deh pā'rwā', (Jean Philippe Guy le Gentil—leh zhŏn'tēl',) Marquis, a French painter and engraver, born in Bretagne in 1750. His engraving of "La moderne Antigone" (1800) was very successful. Died in 1822.

Parque-Castrillo, del, dĕl par'kā kās-trēl'yo, Duke, a Spanish general, born at Valladolid in 1755. He commanded an army which opposed the French invaders in 1809–13. Died in 1832.

Parques, Les. See Parcæ.

Parr, (Catherine.) See Catherine Parr.

Parr, (Harriet,) an English author, known by the literary name of Holme Lee, was born at York in 1828. Besides many novels, she has published a "Life of Jeanne d'Arc," (1866,) etc.

Parr, (Louisa,) an English novelist, was born at London, daughter of Matthew Taylor. Her first story, "How it All Happened," appeared in 1868, and her first novel, "Dorothy Fox," in 1870. Among her later works were "Loyalty George," (1888,) "The Squire," (1892,) "Can this be Love?" (1896,) etc.

Parr, (Richard,) a minister of the Anglican Church, born in the county of Cork, Ireland, in 1617, was chaplain to Archbishop Usher, of whom he wrote a Life, (1686.) Died in 1691.

Parr, (Samuel,) an English scholar and critic, renowned for his learning and colloquial powers, was born at Harrow-on-the-Hill, Middlesex, in 1747. He entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1765, but left it without a degree, and was an usher in Harrow School from 1767 to 1772. He was afterwards master of schools at Colchester and Norwich, and obtained about 1785 the living of Hatton, in Warwickshire. His promotion was hindered by his rather violent partiality to the Whig principles, and the richest benefice he enjoyed was a prebend in Saint Paul's, London. He published several sermons, "Characters of the Late Charles J. Fox, selected and in part written by Philopatris Varvicensis," (2 vols., 1825,) and other works, none of which is of great extent or importance. Died in 1825. Macaulay calls Parr the greatest scholar of that age, and speaks of "his labours in that dark and profound mine from which he had extracted a vast treasure of erudition,—a treasure too often buried in the earth, too often paraded with injudicious and inelegant ostentation, but still precious, massive, and splendid." ("Essay on Warren Hastings.")

Parr, (Thomas,) an Englishman of great longevity, was born in Shropshire in 1483. He was a cultivator of the soil, and was married about the age of one hundred and twenty. It is said that he was able to work after he was one hundred and thirty years old. Died in 1635.

Parradin. See Paradin.

Parrenin, pär'nän', or Parennin, pä'rä'nän', (Dominique,) a French missionary, born near Pontarlier in 1665. In 1698 he went to China, where he obtained the favour of the emperor. He translated some French works into Chinese. His letters to Fontenelle and others were published. Died at Peking in 1741.

Parrhasius, par-rā'she-us, [Παρράσιος,] one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was born at Ephesus, and was the pupil of his father, Evenor. Though he belonged to the Ionic school, he practised his art chiefly at Athens. He flourished about 400 B.C. His peculiar merits consisted in accuracy of design, truth of proportion, and power of expression. In pictures of gods and heroes he established a canon of proportion which was recognized by succeeding artists. Quintilian styled him the legislator of his art. In a trial of skill between him and his rival Zeuxis, the latter painted a bunch of grapes, which the birds took for reality. Flushed with this evidence of his success, Zeuxis called on his rival to draw aside the curtain and show his picture. The picture of Parrhasius was the curtain itself, which Zeuxis had mistaken for real drapery. Among his master-pieces were "Ulysses Feigning Insanity," and an allegorical picture of the Athenian people, or the Demos personified.

See Carlo Dati, "Vite de' Pittori antichi," 1667; K. O. Müller, "Handbuch der Archaeologie der Kunst;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Parrhasius or Parisio, pā-ree'se-o, (Aulus Janus,) an Italian grammarian, born at Cosenza in 1470. He taught eloquence at Milan and Rome, and wrote notes on Horace, Cicero, and Ovid. His chief work is named "De Rebus per Epistolam quæsitis," (Paris, 1567,) in which he explains passages of ancient authors. Died in 1534.

Pär'ris, (Albion K.,) an American Governor and judge, born in Oxford county, Maine, in 1788. He was elected Governor of Maine five times, (1822–27,) became United States Senator in 1827, and was a judge of the supreme court of Maine from 1828 to 1836. Died in 1857.

Pär'rish, (Joseph,) M.D., a distinguished physician of Philadelphia, was born in that city, September 2, 1779. His parents were members of the Society of Friends, and he was educated in strict conformity with the principles and habits of that sect. In early life he received strong religious impressions, by which he was preserved from the temptations incident to a lively and ardent temperament. He had a good English education, and acquired some knowledge of Latin and French. Later in life, like George Fox, he commenced the study of Hebrew, that he might the better understand the Scriptures. But his tastes were rather scientific than literary, and inclined him to the medical profession, the study of which he commenced, after he had completed his twenty first year, in the office of Dr. Caspar Wistar, of the University of Pennsylvania. He took his degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1805, and soon after entered with zeal upon the duties of his profession. In the winter of 1807–8 he became favourably known to the public by a popular course of lectures on chemistry, then a novelty in Philadelphia. In 1808 he married Susanna Cox, whose father, John Cox, of Burlington, was a well-known and estimable minister of the Society of Friends. There has, perhaps, been no example in Philadelphia of a more rapid professional success than that which fell to the lot nf Dr. Parrish. To this result his devotion to his medical duties, and the remarkable kindliness of his disposition, which showed itself not merely in his manners but in innumerable acts of benevolence, powerfully contributed. Later in life he greatly distinguished himself as a surgeon, and was deemed worthy to succeed Dr. Physick as surgeon to the Pennsylvania Hospital, to which position he was elected in 1816, and which he continued to hold, with the highest credit to himself, for thirteen years. Apart from his profession, Dr. Parrish took a deep interest in all benevolent enterprises, and in every movement calculated to relieve the distresses or promote the happiness of mankind. He was long a member, and ultimately president, of the old Pennsylvania Abolition Society, in which office he had been preceded by Drs. Wistar, Rush, and Franklin. He died March 18, 1840.

Of Dr. Parrish's sons, the second, ISAAC, attained a high reputation as a physician, and especially as a surgeon. He died in 1852.

See "Memoir of Dr. Joseph Parrish," read before the Medical Society of Philadelphia, by GEORGE B. WOOD, M.D., October, 1840.

Parrocel, pȧ'ro'sĕl', (BARTHÉLEMI,) a French painter, born at Montbrison. He worked in Spain and Rome with success. Died in France in 1660.

Parrocel, (CHARLES,) a skilful painter of battles, born in Paris in 1688, was a grandson of the preceding. He was patronized by Louis XV., whom he attended in the campaigns of 1744 and 1745. Died in 1752.

Parrocel, (JOSEPH,) a distinguished painter of battles, father of the preceding, was born in Provence in 1648. He worked at Paris, where he settled in 1675, and was employed by Louvois and Louis XIV. to adorn the royal palaces. He also left many etchings. Died in 1704.

Parrocel, (PIERRE,) a nephew of the preceding, was born at Avignon in 1664. He was an able painter of history, and worked in Paris. His chief work is "The Coronation of the Virgin." Died in 1739. His son, JOSEPH IGNACE, born in 1705, painted religious and pastoral subjects, and received the title of painter to the king. Died in 1781.

Parrot, pȧ'ro', (CHRISTOPHE FRÉDÉRIC,) a writer on physical science, born at Montbéliard, in France, in 1751; died about 1810.

Parrot, (GEORGE FRÉDÉRIC,) a distinguished writer, brother of the preceding, was born at Montbéliard in 1767. He became professor of physics at Dorpat in 1800, and a member of the Academy of Sciences of Saint Petersburg in 1826. Among his works is "Outlines (Grundriss) of Theoretical Physics," (2 vols., 1809–11.) Died at Saint Petersburg in 1852.

Parrot, (JOHANN JAKOB FRIEDRICH WILHELM,) a traveller, son of the preceding, was born at Carlsruhe in 1792. He published "Travels in the Crimea and Caucasus," (2 vols., 1815–18,) a "Journey to Ararat," (1834,) and other works. He ascended Mount Ararat about 1830. He was professor of medicine at Dorpat. Died in 1841.

Păr'rŏtt, (ROBERT PARKER,) an American soldier, born at Lee, New Hampshire, October 5, 1804. He graduated at West Point in 1824, and until 1829 was an assistant professor there. In 1836 he left the army and became a cannon-founder at Cold Spring, New York. He invented the rifled artillery which was called by his name. He was a judge of common pleas, 1844–47. Died at Cold Spring, New York, December 24, 1877.

Păr'rў, (CALEB HILLIER,) an English physician, born at Bath in 1756. He practised many years at Bath, and published several works, among which is "Elements of Pathology," (1816.) Sir William Edward Parry was his son. Died in 1822.

Parry, (CHARLES HUBERT,) an English composer, born at Bournemouth in 1848. He became director of the Royal College of Music in 1895. He wrote "The Art of Music," (1894,) and "The Evolution of Music," (1896,) and composed oratorios, symphonies, etc., and the opera "Lancelot and Guinevere."

Păr'rў, (JOHN,) a Welsh musician and musical archæologist of the eighteenth century. His playing on the harp was much admired in London. He published two collections of old music,—"Ancient British Music of the Cambro-Britons," (1742,) and "A Collection of Welsh, English, and Scotch Airs."

Parry, (JOHN,) a Welsh musician and composer, born at Denbigh in 1776. In 1807 he settled in London, and soon became known as a composer of dramatic music. He was author of "The Rise and Progress of the Harp," and editor of a collection of Welsh melodies under the title of "The Welsh Harper." Died April 8, 1851.

Parry, (JOSEPH,) Mus. Doc., a Welsh musician and composer, born at Merthyr in 1841. Among his numerous compositions are the oratorio "Emanuel," and the operas "Blodwen," "Sylvia," "King Arthur," etc.

Parry, (RICHARD,) an English divine, born in London in 1722, was rector of Wichampton. He published, besides other works, a "Harmony of the Four Gospels." Died in 1780.

Parry, (Sir WILLIAM EDWARD,) an English navigator, (usually called Sir EDWARD PARRY,) born at Bath in 1790, was a son of Caleb H. Parry, noticed above. He served as lieutenant in the war against the United States in 1814, and accompanied Captain Ross in an exploring voyage in 1818. He obtained command of an expedition for the discovery of a Northwest Passage, and sailed with the Hecla and Griper in May, 1819. Having passed through Lancaster Sound, he explored a contiguous strait, which he named Barrow's Strait, and gained a reward of £5000 offered to the navigator who should penetrate beyond the meridian of 110° W., (within the Arctic circle.) He passed the winter at Melville Island, returned home in November, 1820, and wrote a journal of his voyage, published in 1821.

He made subsequent attempts to find the Northwest Passage in 1821 and 1824, without success, and in 1827 attempted to reach the pole by boats and sledges from Spitzbergen, attaining the high latitude of 82° 45′ N. He was made rear-admiral in 1852. Died in 1855.

Parseval-Grandmaison, pȧrs'vȧl' grŏN'mȧ'zŏN', (FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE,) a French poet, born in Paris in 1759. He went to Egypt with the army in 1798 as poet of the expedition, and was one of the friends whom Bonaparte received on board of the ship which conveyed him to France. He wrote a "Dithyramb on the Marriage of Napoleon," (1810,) "Philippe Auguste," a heroic poem, (1825,) and other works. Died in 1834.

Par'sons, (ALFRED WILLIAM,) an English painter, born at Beckington in 1847. He began the study of painting, without masters, in 1867, and afterwards exhibited a large number of paintings. With F. D. Millet, in 1891, he made a series of illustrations of the Danube. In 1892 he painted landscapes in Japan. He was made an A.R.A. in 1897.

Parsons, (FRANK,) an American sociologist, born at Mount Holly, New Jersey, in 1854. In 1897 he became professor of history and political science at Kansas Agricultural College. His works include "The World's Best Books," "The Drift of Our Time," etc., and he has written and lectured largely on monopoly, socialism, government, etc.

Par'sŏns, (JAMES,) F.R.S., an English physician and antiquary, born at Barnstaple in 1705. He practised in London, contributed several treatises on physiology, etc. to the "Philosophical Transactions," and wrote an antiquarian work called "The Remains of Japhet," (1767.) Died in 1770.

Parsons, (JOHN,) an English physician, born in Yorkshire in 1742. He became professor of medicine or anatomy at Oxford about 1780. Died in 1785.

Par'sŏns, (JONATHAN,) an American Presbyterian clergyman and scholar, born at West Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1705. He preached for many years at Newburyport, and published several volumes of sermons. Died in 1776.

Parsons, (MOSES,) an eminent American preacher, born in Massachusetts in 1716, graduated at Harvard.

He was minister at Byfield, Massachusetts. Died in 1783.

Parsons, (PHILIP,) an English clergyman, born at Dedham in 1729, was vicar of Wye. He wrote "Newmarket, an Essay on the Turf," (1774,) "Simplicity," a poem, (1784,) and other works. Died in 1812.

Parsons, [Lat. PERSO'NIUS,] (ROBERT,) an English Jesuit, born in Somersetshire in 1546, was remarkable for his subtlety as a disputant and his talent for intrigue. As an emissary of the court of Rome, he went to England with Campian about 1580, and attempted to foment a rebellion. He published several seditious writings. He was turbulent, audacious, and unscrupulous. Died at Rome in 1610.

Parsons, (SAMUEL HOLDEN,) an American general and lawyer, born at Lyme, Connecticut, in 1737, was a son of Jonathan, noticed above. He is said to have first suggested a general Congress. Died in Ohio in 1789.

Parsons, (THEOPHILUS,) an eminent American jurist, born in Essex county, Massachusetts, the 24th of February, 1750. He graduated at Harvard College in 1769, and studied law at Falmouth, (now Portland,) in Maine, where he was admitted to the bar in 1774; but he afterwards removed to Newburyport. He was a member of the convention which, in 1779, framed the State Constitution of Massachusetts, and was also a member of the convention called to ratify the Constitution of the United States in 1789. In 1800 he removed to Boston. He was appointed in 1806 chief justice of Massachusetts, in which office he displayed signal ability. As a lawyer, "he had," according to Justice Story, "no equal in Massachusetts;" and he probably had few, if any, superiors in the United States. A collection of his judicial opinions was published, under the title of "Commentaries on the Law of the United States." Died in 1813.

Parsons, (THEOPHILUS,) an eminent jurist, a son of the preceding, was born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1797. He graduated in 1815 at Harvard College, where he became in 1847 Dane professor of law. He is the author of a "Treatise on the Law of Contracts," (1853,) and various other legal works, "Deus Homo," (1867,) "The Infinite and the Finite," (1872,) and "The Rights of a Citizen of the United States," (1875.) He died January 26, 1882.

Parsons, (THOMAS WILLIAM,) an American poet, born in Boston in 1819. He produced in 1843 a version of "The First Ten Cantos of Dante's Inferno," which was pronounced "the most successful reproduction of the spirit and power of the Divina Commedia in the English language. . . . His 'Hudson River' is the noblest tribute any stream on this continent has received from a poet, and his lines 'On the Death of Daniel Webster' are far better than anything else ever written in verse on the death of an American statesman." (Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America," p. 559.) He published a volume of poems in 1854. Died September 3, 1892.

Parsons, (WILLIAM,) an English comic actor, born in 1736, was also a painter. Died in 1795.

Par'tŏn, (ERNEST,) an American artist, of late a resident of London, England, was born at Hudson, New York, March 17, 1845. When twenty years old, he took a studio in New York, and in 1873 he removed to London. Among his pictures are "The High Hall Garden," "Au Bord de l'Eau," "The Waning of the Year," and "Woodland Home."

Par'tŏn, (JAMES,) an able and popular writer and journalist, born at Canterbury, England, in 1822, became a resident of New York, where he was for a time associate editor of the "Home Journal." He published a "Life of Horace Greeley," (1855,) "Life of Aaron Burr," (1857,) "Life of Andrew Jackson," (1860,) a "Life of General Butler," (1863,) "Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin," (1864,) "Life of John Jacob Astor," (1865,) "Famous Americans of Recent Times," (1867,) "Life of Thomas Jefferson," (1874,) "Caricature in all Times and Lands," (1878,) "Life of Voltaire," (1881,) "Captains of Industry," (1884 and 1891,) with other works. Died October 17, 1891.

Parton, (SARAH PAYSON WILLIS,) the wife of the preceding, and sister of the poet, N. P. Willis, was born at Portland, Maine, in 1811. She published, under the pseudonym of FANNY FERN, "Fern Leaves," (1853,) "Little Ferns," (1853,) "Ruth Hall," (1854,) "The Play-Day Book," (1856,) "Fresh Leaves," (1857,) and "Rose Clark," (1857.) Her works obtained great popularity in the United States, and were republished in England. She died October 10, 1872.

Part'rĭdge, (ALDEN,) an American teacher of military schools, born at Norwich, Vermont, about 1785. He graduated at West Point in 1806. He was the leader of a party which surveyed and determined the northeast boundary of the United States, in 1819. He opened military schools at Norwich, Vermont, (1820,) Middletown, Connecticut, (1825,) Portsmouth, Virginia, (1840,) and elsewhere. Died in 1854.

Part'rĭdge, (SAMUEL WILLIAM,) an English poet, born in London in 1810. He is the author of "Our English Months, a Poem on the Seasons in England."

Partridge, (WILLIAM ORDWAY,) sculptor, born at Paris, France, in 1861. He studied art in Paris, Florence, and Rome, became an art professor in New York, and produced numerous works of sculpture, including the statue of Shakspeare at Lincoln Park, Chicago. He published several works on art.

Paruta, pä-roo'tȧ, (FILIPPO,) an antiquary, born at Palermo. He wrote "Sicily Described by Medals," ("La Sicilia descritta con Medaglie," 1612,) reprinted in 1649 and 1697. Died in 1629.

Paruta, (PAOLO,) an eminent Italian historian and diplomatist, born at Venice in 1540. He was sent as ambassador to the pope in 1592, before which he had held several high offices. In 1596 he became procurator of Saint Mark, the highest functionary in the state except one. He wrote "On the Perfection of Political Life," ("Della Perfezione della Vita politica," 1579,) which was translated into English and French, and a "History of Venice from 1513 to 1551," ("Storia Veneziana," 1605,) which is highly commended. "He was the first," says Daru, "who introduced the details of civil history into his narrative." His "Political Discourses" ("Discorsi politici," 1599) are judicious, and sometimes profound. Died in 1598.

Pârvătî, par'vȧ-tee', (i.e. the "mountain [goddess,"]) [from the Sanscrit pârvătă, a "mountain,"] in the Hindoo mythology, the name of the consort or Săktî of Siva, was supposed to be the daughter of Himâla, the sovereign of the snowy mountains in the north of India. She is known by a multitude of names, according to her various characters, such as BHAVÂNÎ, corresponding to the "Venus genetrix" of the Romans; DURGA, so called in her character of active or militant virtue; KÂLÎ, (i.e. "black" or "terrible,") applied to her in her most terrible form, when she appears as the destroyer of the enemies of the gods; and PÂRVATÎ, as the devoted wife and inseparable companion of Siva. She (like Juno) may be regarded as a personification of femineity. (See SIVA.)

Pascal. See PASCHAL I.

Pascal, pȧs'kȧl', (ADRIEN,) a French military writer, born about 1815. He published, besides other works, "The Military Life of Louis Philippe," (1841,) a "History of the Army, and of all the Regiments, from the Thirteenth Century to our Times," (4 vols., 1845–49,) and a "History of Napoleon III.," (1853.) Died 1863.

Pascal, pas'kal, [Fr. pron. pȧs'kȧl'; Lat. PASCHA'LIS,] (BLAISE,) a celebrated French philosopher and mathematician, was born at Clermont-Ferrand, in Auvergne, on the 19th of June, 1623. He was the only son of Étienne Pascal, president of the court of aids, and Antoinette Begon. He was very inquisitive in his early childhood, and showed an extraordinary aptitude for geometry; but his father, who directed his education, wished him to study the ancient languages, to the exclusion of geometry, and carefully concealed from him all works on that science. In his twelfth year, however, he was surprised in the act of demonstrating propositions, having privately discovered or learned the elements of geometry without the aid of books. His father then ceased to restrain him from the study of the science to which he was so powerfully attracted. It is stated that at the age of sixteen he wrote a treatise on Conic Sections which astonished Descartes. He made rapid progress in mathematics, and soon began to associate with Mersenne and Roberval. About the age of eighteen he invented an ingenious calculating-machine. His constitution was always delicate, and his health was probably impaired by excessive application to study. After the age of eighteen he was a continual sufferer. In 1648 he made with the barometer, on the mountain called Puy de Dôme, a celebrated experiment, which established the theory of atmospheric pressure and exploded the ancient error that nature abhors a vacuum. He wrote two treatises entitled "On the Equilibrium of Fluids," and "On the Weight of the Atmosphere." In the experiment just mentioned he was assisted by M. Perier, his brother-in-law. Impressed by powerful religious convictions, he renounced in 1649 the brilliant prospect of temporal renown towards which his genius was conducting him, and turned his attention from scientific pursuits. In 1654 he narrowly escaped from a dangerous accident to which he was exposed by his unruly horses as he was riding in a carriage on the Pont de Neuilly. This event confirmed his resolution to devote himself to religious duties and a life of retirement. He became very abstemious in his diet, denied himself many innocent enjoyments, and subjected himself to a severely ascetic discipline. It is stated that he beggared himself by his prodigal benefactions to the poor, and that he wore beneath his clothes a girdle of iron armed with sharp points as an instrument of self-imposed penance. He entered the cloister of Port-Royal, to which his sister Jacqueline had retired several years before, and there enjoyed the society of Arnauld, Le Saci, Nicole, Saint-Cyran, (Duvergier,) and other Jansenist writers.

In 1656 he produced his celebrated "Provincial Letters," the full title of which is "Lettres écrites par Louis de Montalte à un Provincial de ses Amis et aux Jésuites sur la Morale et la Politique de ces Pères," ("Letters written by Louis de Montalte to the Jesuits," etc.) "Pascal," says Hallam, "by his 'Provincial Letters,' did more to ruin the name of Jesuit than all the controversies of Protestantism or all the fulminations of the Parliament of Paris. . . . He has accumulated so long a list of scandalous decisions, and dwelt upon them with so much wit and spirit, and yet with so serious a severity, that the order of Loyola became a byword with mankind." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Voltaire expressed the opinion that "Molière's best comedies do not excel these Letters in wit, nor the compositions of Bossuet excel them in sublimity." The most competent French critics, including Voltaire and D'Alembert, concur in the judgment that the "Provincial Letters" contributed more than any other composition to form and polish the French language. There is not a single word in these Letters that has become obsolete. "The severely pure and simple taste," says Henry Rogers, "which reigns in Pascal's style seems, when we reflect on those vices which more or less infected universal letters, little less than a miraculous felicity. . . . Upon all the great features of his moral character one dwells with the serenest delight. Greatly as he is to be admired, he is yet more to be loved. His humility and simplicity, conspicuous as his genius and acquisitions, were those of a very child." ("Edinburgh Review" for January, 1847.) In one instance he relapsed into the study of the abstract sciences which he had renounced. About 1658 he diverted his attention from the pain which deprived him of sleep by entertaining a luminous idea which presented itself to him and led him to some important discoveries in relation to the problem of the cycloid. Before he made these public, he challenged the mathematicians of Europe to solve the problem, and offered a prize to him who should succeed. Several persons competed for the prize, but the judges decided that none of their solutions fulfilled the conditions of the challenge. He published in 1659 a Treatise on the Cycloid, ("Traité général de la Roulette.") He meditated and began to compose an extensive and systematic work on the fundamental truths of religion and the evidences of Christianity, which he did not live to finish; but he left in manuscript numerous detached sentences which are supposed to be fragments of that work. They were published in 1670, under the title of "Thoughts of Pascal," ("Pensées de Pascal,") not without suppressions and alterations. A more correct edition was published by M. Prosper Faugère in 1844. "The Thoughts of Pascal," says Hallam, "are to be ranked, as a monument of his genius, above the 'Provincial Letters, though some have asserted the contrary. They burn with an intense light; condensed in expression, sublime, energetic, rapid, they hurry away the reader, till he is scarcely able or willing to distinguish the sophisms from the truth they contain. For that many of them are incapable of bearing a calm scrutiny is very manifest to those who apply such a test. The notes of Voltaire, though always intended to detract, are sometimes unanswerable; but the splendour of Pascal's eloquence absolutely annihilates, in effect on the general reader, even this antagonist." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.")

Among his works are "New Experiments on the Vacuum," ("Nouvelles Expériences touchant le Vide,") "History of the Cycloid," ("Histoire de la Roulette,") and "De l'Esprit géométrique." He endured with fortitude the maladies which in his latter years were aggravated by his ascetic habits, and died in Paris on the 19th of August, 1662. His complete works were published by Bossut, (in 5 vols. 8vo, 1779.) Prosper Faugère published in 1844 two volumes of "Thoughts, Fragments, and Letters of Blaise Pascal," many of which had never before been printed. "His intellectual powers," says Macaulay, "were such as have rarely been bestowed on any of the children of men; and the vehemence of the zeal which animated him was but too well proved by the cruel penances and vigils under which his macerated frame sank into an early grave. His spirit was the spirit of Saint Bernard; but the delicacy of his wit, the purity, the energy, the simplicity of his rhetoric, had never been equalled, except by the great masters of Attic eloquence. All Europe read and admired, laughed and wept. The Jesuits attempted to reply, but their feeble answers were received with shouts of mockery." ("History of England," vol. ii. p. 18.)

Pascal, (FRANÇOIS MICHEL,) a French sculptor, born in Paris about 1815. He gained a medal of the second class in 1848. Died in 1882.

Pascal, (JACQUELINE,) a sister of Blaise Pascal, was born at Clermont in 1625. She was beautiful and highly gifted. About the age of ten she began to write verses, some of which were printed in 1638. The poet Corneille, who often visited the family of Pascal, aided in the development of her poetic talent. She became religious in 1646, and entered the convent of Port-Royal in 1652. She wrote a powerful letter on the formulary which the nuns were required to sign, and which condemned Jansenism. She died in 1661. "To annihilate self," says M. Vinet, "and then to efface the most minute traces of that very annihilation, had been the task of this heroic girl for years. She had deemed it her especial duty to mortify her noble intellect; but she was unable to destroy it: it still clung to her. And, though every thing which she achieved or wrote bears the stamp of mental superiority, there is nothing comparable in this respect to the 'Letter on the Formulary.'"

Pas'chal [It. PASQUALE, pȧs-kwȧ'lȧ; Fr. PASCAL, pȧs'kȧl'; Lat. PASCHA'LIS] I., POPE, a native of Rome, was elected as successor to Stephen V. in 817 A.D. He crowned the emperor Lothaire in 823. Died in 824.

Paschal II., POPE, (RAINIERI,) born near Viterbo, succeeded Urban II. in 1099. He maintained a contest on the subject of investitures with the emperor Henry V., who marched with an army to Rome in 1110, arrested the pope after a violent resistence, and extorted from him a concession of the right of investiture. This concession of Paschal was condemned by a council which he convoked. He was too feeble and irresolute to maintain the supremacy of the papal power. He died in 1118, and was succeeded by Gelasius II.

Paschal III., ANTI-POPE, (GUIDO DI CREMA, gwee'do de krā'mȧ,) was elected in 1164 or 1165 in opposition to Alexander III., and was recognized by the emperor Frederick I. He died at Rome in 1168.

Pascoli, pȧs'ko-lee, (ALESSANDRO,) an Italian physician, born at Perugia in 1669. He became professor of anatomy in Rome, and published several works. Died in 1757.

Pascoli, (LEONE,) an Italian biographer, brother of the preceding, was born at Perugia in 1674. He wrote "Lives of Perugian Painters, Sculptors, and Architects," (1732,) and "The Lives of Modern Painters, Sculptors, and Architects," (2 vols., 1736,) both in Italian. Died in 1744.

Pas'i-clēs, a Greek philosopher, lived probably between 400 and 350 B.C. He was at one time the head of the school of Megara.

Pasinelli, pȧ-se-nel'lee, or Passinelli, pȧs-se-nel'lee, (LORENZO,) an Italian painter, born at Bologna in 1629, was a pupil of Cantarini. He imitated the noble manner of Paul Veronese, whom, it is said, he equalled in design. "His colour is so fresh and brilliant," says the "Biographie Universelle," "that one might take his works for the productions of the best time of the Venetian school." Among his master-pieces are "The Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem," and a "Holy Family." Died in 1700.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Pasini, pȧ-see'nee, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian linguist, born about 1690. He published a Hebrew Grammar, (1721,) and a "Latin-Italian Dictionary," ("Vocabolario Italiano e Latino," 1731,) often reprinted. Died about 1770.

Pa-siph'a-e, [Gr. Πασιφάη; Fr. PASIPHAÉ, pȧ'ze'fȧ'ȧ',] a fabulous personage, said to be a daughter of Helios, a sister of Circe, and the wife of Minos. Among her children were Androgeos, Ariadne, Phædra, and the Minotaur, the last of whom was fabled to be the offspring of a bull.

Pa-sit'e-lēs, [Πασιτέλης,] an excellent statuary and silver-chaser, of Greek origin, who lived at Rome. He was a minor when he obtained the right of Roman citizenship, about 90 B.C. He improved the art of modelling. Pliny represents him as a great artist, and mentions one of his works,—an ivory statue of Jupiter. He was also an eminent writer on art. He appears to have been living in 30 B.C.

Paskevitch or Paskewitsch, pȧs-kā'vitch, written also Paskievitch, (IVAN FEODOROVITCH,) Prince of Warsaw, (in French, "Prince de Varsovie,") a celebrated Russian general, born at Poltava in 1782. He served at Austerlitz, (1805,) received several wounds at Brailof, (1809,) and obtained command of a brigade in 1811. In 1812 he distinguished himself at Borodino, and gained advantages over the French in several actions. Having been selected to conduct an army against the Persians in 1825, he gained a victory at Elizabethpol, and took Erivan in 1827. For his successes in a war against the Turks (1828–29) he obtained the rank of field-marshal. In 1831 he took the command against the revolted Poles, and ended the war by the capture of Warsaw. For these services he was created Prince of Warsaw and made Governor-General of Poland. He was successful in his operations against the Hungarians in 1849, but failed at the siege of Silistria, in 1854. Died in 1856.

Pā'tẹr, (WALTER H.,) a British critic of the "æsthetic" school, born in 1839. He was educated at Oxford, and became a Fellow of Brasenose College. His "Studies in the History of the Renaissance," (1873,) though an elaborate, refined, and thoughtful work, has met with severe criticism. His stand-point is that of the Epicurean, and his plea is for "art for art's sake." Other works of high standing are "Marius the Epicurean," (1885,) "Appreciations," (1889,) "Miscellaneous Studies," (1895,) and "Gaston de la Tour," (an unfinished romance, 1897.) Died in 1894.

Pạ-tẹr'cu-lus, (C. VELLEIUS,) a Roman historian, born about 20 B.C. He entered the army in the reign of Augustus, and became a military tribune. He served under Tiberius, in Germany, as prefect or legatus, between 4 and 12 A.D., and gained the favour of the future emperor. On the accession of Tiberius, in the year 14, he was chosen prætor. He wrote a valuable historical compendium, ("Historiæ Romanæ,") the object of which is to give a brief view of universal history, in connection with that of Rome. He is considered impartial, except where he speaks of Augustus and Tiberius, whom he flatters extravagantly. His style is admired for clearness, conciseness, and energy. He is supposed to have died soon after 30 A.D.

Patrocle. See PATROCLUS.

Pa-tro'clēs, [Πατροκλῆς,] a Greek statuary, mentioned by Pliny and Pausanias, lived probably about 400 B.C.

Patrocles, a Macedonian general, was appointed commander at Babylon by Seleucus I. about 312 B.C. He was commander-in chief of the army of Antiochus I. about 280 B.C. He wrote a work on the geography of India, etc., which is not extant.

Pa-tro'clus, [Gr. Πάτροκλος; Fr. PATROCLE, pȧ'trŏkl',] a Greek hero, a son of Menœtius, and the dearest friend of Achilles, with whom he fought at the siege of Troy. Having borrowed the armour of Achilles, he slew a multitude of Trojans, but was killed by Hector, aided by Apollo.

Pā'tron, [Gr. Πάτρων,] an Epicurean philosopher, lived at Rome, associated with Cicero, and was a friend of Atticus. He afterwards went to Athens, and became the head of the Epicurean school in 52 B.C.

Patru, pȧ'trü', (OLIVIER,) an eminent French advocate, born in Paris in 1604. He made some reforms in forensic eloquence, and polished his style with minute attention. He had a high reputation as a critic, and has been compared to Quintilian. In 1640 he was admitted into the French Academy. The speech which he made at his reception became a precedent for all such occasions. His works were published in 1681. Died in 1681.

Patte, pȧt, (PIERRE,) a French architect, born in Paris in 1723. He wrote several works on architecture. Died in 1814.

Pat'ten, (SIMON NELSON,) an American economist, was born at Sandwich, Illinois, in 1852, and became professor of political economy at the University of Pennsylvania in 1888. He published several works on political economy, also "Theory of Social Forces," "Development of English Thought," etc.

Pat'tẹr-sŏn, (DANIEL T.,) a distinguished naval officer, born in the State of New York, served in the war of 1812, and in 1814 commanded the naval forces at New Orleans. He received the thanks of Congress for the part he took in the defence of that city. Died in 1839.

Patterson, (FRANCIS ENGLE,) an American general, son of General Robert Patterson, noticed below, was born in Philadelphia in 1821. He served in the Mexican war, and, as brigadier-general of volunteers, fought under General McClellan in 1862 in his campaign against Richmond. He was killed by the accidental discharge of his pistol in November of that year.

Patterson, (ROBERT,) LL.D., born in Ireland in 1743, emigrated to America, and was appointed in 1779 professor of mathematics in the University of Pennsylvania. He became director of the United States Mint in 1805, and was also president of the American Philosophical Society. Died in 1824.

Patterson, (ROBERT,) a general, born in the county of Tyrone, Ireland, in 1792, emigrated to Philadelphia in his youth, and became a merchant. He commanded a division at Cerro Gordo in 1847. In June, 1861, he obtained command of an army of about 20,000 men, which he moved across the Potomac on the 2d of July. He was instructed to defeat or hold in check the army of General J. E. Johnston near Winchester, but he failed to effect this object, while Johnston marched to Bull Run and decided the victory of July 21. General Patterson was, in consequence, severely censured by many. On the 18th of July, General Scott had written to him, "I have certainly been expecting you to beat the enemy. . . . You have been at least his equal, and, I suppose, superior, in numbers." General Scott, however, appears not to have been aware of the actual strength of Johnston's army, which is now admitted to have been superior to that of his opponent in the field. General Patterson was honourably discharged when the term of service of his troops had expired. Died August 7, 1881.

Pat'tẹr-sŏn, (ROBERT HOGARTH,) a British author, born in Edinburgh in 1821. He published "The New Revolution," (1860,) "Essays in History and Art," (1861,) "The Economy of Capital," (1864,) "The Science of Finance," (1867,) "The State, the Poor, and the Country," (1870,) etc., and was prominent as a conservative journalist. Died December 16, 1886.

Patterson or Paterson, (WILLIAM,) an American statesman and jurist, born in New Jersey, or at sea, about 1744. He was one of the delegates representing New Jersey in the Convention which formed the federal Constitution in 1787. He was a United States Senator in 1789–90, and was Governor of New Jersey from 1791 to 1794. In the latter year he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the United States. He is said to have been an upright judge. Died in 1806.

Pat'te-sŏn, (JOHN COLERIDGE,) an English missionary, a grand-nephew of the poet Coleridge, was born in London, April 1, 1827. He was educated at Eton, and at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1854 he went with Selwyn as a missionary to New Zealand, and in 1861 was consecrated Missionary Bishop of Melanesia, in which capacity he laboured with great devotion. Having landed on the island of Nukapu, he was murdered by the natives, September 20, 1871. (See his "Life," by his cousin, C. M. Yonge, 1874.)

Patti, pȧt'tee, (ADELINA MARIA CLORINDA,) a popular operatic singer, of Italian extraction, was born in Madrid in 1843. She performed at New York in 1859, and in 1861 made her first appearance in London, and became at once a distinguished favourite with the public. She was received with equal applause in the chief cities of the continent. Her voice is a high soprano. In 1868 she was married to the Marquis de Caux, from whom she was divorced, and in 1886 to Signor Nicolini.

Patti, (CARLOTTA,) an excellent singer, a sister of the preceding, performed with success at concerts in Europe and America. She married, September 3, 1879, Ernest de Munck, of Weimar. Died June 28, 1889.

Pat'tī-sŏn, (DOROTHY WYNDLOW,) better known as SISTER DORA, an English philanthropist, born at Hauxwell, Yorkshire, January 16, 1832. In 1864 she joined the Anglican Sisterhood of Good Samaritans, and in 1865 was sent to Walsall as a hospital-nurse, where she remained for the principal part of her life, though she finally withdrew from the sisterhood in 1874. Died at Walsall, December 24, 1878. The best account of her life and remarkable labours is "Sister Dora, a Biography," by Margaret Lonsdale.

Pattison, (MARK,) D.D., an English clergyman, born at Hornby in 1813. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1840 was made a Fellow of Lincoln College. He was author of one of the once-famous "Essays and Reviews," and published a life of Casaubon, (1875,) "Life of Milton," (1880,) and other works. Died in 1884.

Pattison, (ROBERT EMORY,) ex-Governor of Pennsylvania, was born at Quantico, Maryland, in 1850. He went to Philadelphia, became comptroller of that city in 1877, and Democratic Governor of Pennsylvania in 1882 and again in 1891, a notable fact in that strongly Republican State.

Pat'tī-sŏn, (WILLIAM,) an English poet, born in Sussex in 1706; died in 1727.

Pat'tọn, (FRANCIS LANDEY,) D.D., LL.D., an eminent divine, born in Bermuda, January 22, 1843. He was educated at University and Knox Colleges, Toronto, and at Princeton Theological Seminary. After holding various Presbyterian pastorates, he was called in 1872 to be professor of didactic theology in the seminary at Chicago. In 1881 he became professor in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and in 1888 was chosen president of Princeton College. He published a "Treatise on Inspiration," a "Summary of Christian Doctrine," "Doctrine of a Future Retribution," etc.

Patton, (JACOB HARRIS,) an American author, born in Fayette county, Pennsylvania, about 1820. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1839, and at the Union Theological Seminary in 1846. His principal works are "History of the United States," (1859,) "Natural Resources of the United States," (1879,) "History of the American People," (2 vols., 1882,) "The Yorktown Memorial," (1882,) and "The Democratic Party, its History and Influence," (1884.)

Patu, pȧ'tü', (CLAUDE PIERRE,) a French dramatic poet, born in Paris in 1729; died in 1757.

Patuzzi, pȧ-toot'see, (GIOVANNI VINCENZO,) an Italian theologian, born at Conegliano in 1700, was a Dominican friar. Among his works is "Moral Theology," (7 vols., 1790.) Died in 1769.

Patzke, pȧts'kẹh, (JOHANN SAMUEL,) a German minister and poet, born near Frankfort-on-the-Oder in 1727. He became a popular preacher at Magdeburg. He published sermons, hymns, dramas, and a translation of Tacitus, (6 vols., 1765–77.) Died in 1787.

Paucton, pōk'tôN', (ALEXIS JEAN PIERRE,) a French mathematician, born in Maine in 1732 or 1736. He wrote an excellent work named "Métrologie, or a Treatise on the Measures, Weights, and Coins of Ancient and Modern Nations," (1780.) Died in Paris in 1798.

Pauditz, pŏw'dits, (CHRISTOPH,) a painter, born in Lower Saxony about 1618, was a pupil of Rembrandt. He was patronized by Albert Sigismund, Duke of Bavaria. He painted history and genre. Died in 1646.

Paul, [Gr. Παῦλος; Lat. PAU'LUS; Fr. PAUL, pōl; It. PAOLO, pŏw'lo; Ger. PAULUS, pŏw'lûs; Sp. PABLO, pȧ'blo,] SAINT, the great Apostle of the Gentiles, originally called SAUL, was a native of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia. He was a Jew and a Roman citizen by birthright, and a rigid Pharisee by education. He probably studied Greek literature at Tarsus, which was then a celebrated seat of learning, and he learned the trade of a tent-maker. He afterwards received instruction in the law from Gamaliel, an eminent rabbi and jurist at Jerusalem. (Acts xxii. 3.) He became a zealous supporter of the Jewish religion and a violent persecutor of the Christians. The first passage of Scripture in which he is mentioned is Acts vii. 58, narrating the death of the martyr Stephen, to which Saul was accessory. During a journey from Jerusalem to Damascus, about 36 A.D., he was miraculously converted and ordained an apostle to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. (Acts ix.) He went from Damascus into Arabia, and had an interview with Saint Peter at Jerusalem about the year 39, after which he preached for several years in Syria and Cilicia. He passed a whole year at Antioch, where he "taught much people." About 45 A.D. Saul and Barnabas departed from Antioch on an extensive mission to the Gentiles. They traversed the island of Cyprus, from which they passed into Asia Minor, and Paul preached a memorable sermon at Antioch in Pisidia. Though violently persecuted, they converted many at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, and returned in 47 A.D. to Antioch in Syria, where they abode a long time. In the course of a second apostolic journey he founded churches at Philippi and Thessalonica, and uttered a remarkable discourse at Athens. He also made many converts at Corinth, where he remained a year and a half, and where he wrote the Epistles to the Thessalonians. Much diversity of opinion prevails among the learned about the date of the principal events of his life. The divine origin of his doctrine was attested by many miracles, by "signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds." (II. Cor. xii. 12.)

After he had visited Jerusalem the fourth time since his conversion, he commenced a third apostolic tour. He laboured for about two years at Ephesus, and afterwards revisited the churches of Macedonia and Greece. About the year 59 he was again at Jerusalem, the populace of which assailed him, and would have killed him, but an officer took him into custody and sent him to the Roman governor Felix, at Cæsarea. He was confined in prison there for a long time, defended himself by a noble and eloquent speech before King Agrippa, and appealed to Cæsar. He was taken by sea to Rome, where he "dwelt two whole years in his own hired house," and preached the gospel without hindrance. We have no authentic record of his death; but, according to tradition, he suffered martyrdom at Rome about 66 A.D.

"In perusing the history and writings of Saint Paul," says W. L. Alexander, "it is impossible not to be struck with the amazing energy of thought and action by which he was characterized. . . . Removed alike from the extremes of fanaticism on the one hand and apathy on the other, his whole life was a noble instance of the consecration, on sound and elevated principles, of the highest powers and the most indefatigable energies to a work in which he had no personal interest apart from that of his fellow-Christians. . . . In his peculiar capacity as one of the founders of the Christian Church and an inspired expositor of divine truth, he stands without a rival in his claims upon our gratitude and reverence." ("Encyclopædia Britannica," article "Paul.")

Paul [Lat. PAU'LUS; It. PAOLO, pŏw'lo] I., a native of Rome, was elected pope, as successor to Stephen III., in 757 A.D. Died in 767 or 768. He was succeeded by Stephen IV.

Paul II., POPE, (PIETRO Barbo—baR'bo,) a native of Venice, and a nephew of Eugene IV., was born in 1418. He succeeded Pius II. in 1464. He was unfavourable to human learning, and suppressed an academy of literati which was formed in Rome. He was the first who gave the cardinals the privilege to wear purple. He died in 1471, and was succeeded by Sixtus IV.

See MICHEL CANESE, "Vie de Paul II." 1740.

Paul III., POPE, (ALESSANDRO Farnese—far-nā'sȧ,) was born at Canino about 1466. He succeeded Clement VII. in 1534. He approved the newly-formed order of the Jesuits about 1540. To oppose the progress of Luther, he convoked a council, which, after a delay of several years, met at Trent in 1545. Before the last date he excommunicated Henry VIII. of England. He sent about 12,000 troops to fight for Charles V. against the Protestant princes of Germany, and obtained for his grandson, Ottavio Farnese, the hand of Margaret, a daughter of the emperor. Paul protested against the interim treaty of peace which Charles V. granted to the Protestants in 1547. He died in November, 1549, and was succeeded by Julius III.

See QUIRINI, "Imago Pontificis Pauli III.;" ONUFRIO PANVINIO, "Vita Pauli III.;" RANKE, "History of the Popes;" ROBERTSON, "History of Charles V.," vols. ii. and iii.

Paul IV., POPE, (GIAN PIETRO Caraffa—kȧ-rȧf'fȧ,) born at Capriglio about 1476, was elected pope in 1555. He was intolerant and tyrannical. He quarrelled with Philip II. of Spain, whose army under the Duke of Alva blockaded Rome in 1557 and compelled the pope to sue for peace. He refused to recognize Elizabeth as Queen of England, and by his arrogant course promoted the triumph of Protestantism in England. He died in 1559, and was succeeded by Pius IV., who put to death two nephews of Paul IV. for their crimes.

See BROMATO, "Vita di Paolo IV.," 1748; RANKE, "History of the Popes;" ROBERTSON, "History of Charles V.," vol. iii. books xi. and xii.

Paul V., POPE, (CAMILLO Borghese—boR-gā'sȧ,) born at Rome in 1552, succeeded Leo XI. in 1605. He was involved in a contest with the Venetians respecting the trial of ecclesiastics by lay tribunals, the foundation of religious houses, etc., and placed Venice under interdict in 1606. The senate of Venice retaliated by banishing the Jesuits. Through the mediation of Henry IV. of France, a compromise was effected in 1607. He died in 1621, and was succeeded by Gregory XV.

Paul [Russ. PAVLOF, pâv'lof] I., (Petrovitch, pa-tro'vitch,) Emperor of Russia, born in 1754, was the son of Peter III. and Catherine II. After the assassination of his father by order of Catherine, Paul was treated by her with great severity, and deprived of all participation in public affairs. He married Mary of Würtemberg in 1776. On his accession to the throne, in 1796, he distinguished himself for a time by his liberal policy towards Poland, and in 1798 joined the coalition against France. He sent an army under Suwarow (Soovórof) to Italy to fight against the French. (See SUWAROW.) In a fit of caprice, he left his former allies, and attempted to form a coalition against England, in 1800. His numerous acts of folly and tyranny at length caused a conspiracy to take his life, at the head of which was Count Pahlen. Under pretence of compelling him to sign an abdication of the throne, the conspirators forced their way into his chamber and put him to death, (March, 1801.) His death was not regretted by his subjects. He was succeeded by his son, Alexander I. He left three other sons, Constantine, Nicholas, and Michael, and several daughters.

Paul, pŏwl, (FRIEDRICH WILHELM,) Duke of Würtemberg, a German naturalist and traveller, born at Carlsruhe in 1797. He visited North America, the southern parts of Europe, and Egypt, and made valuable collections of objects in natural history. Died in 1860.

Paul, (GABRIEL R.,) an American general, born in Missouri about 1814, graduated at West Point in 1834. He served as captain in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) and became a brigadier-general of Union volunteers in 1862. He was severely wounded at Gettysburg, July, 1863, losing both his eyes. Died May 5, 1886.

Paul, (SAINT VINCENT DE.) See VINCENT.

Paul [Sp. PABLO, pâ'blo] de Burgos, (dâ bōōr'gōs,) or Paul de Santa Maria, (dâ sân'tâ mâ-ree'â,) a Spanish bishop, born at Burgos about 1350, was converted from Judaism to Christianity. Died in 1435.

Paul (or Paulus) [Gr. Παῦλος] of Samosata, [Fr, PAUL DE SAMOSATE, pōl dẹh sâ'mo'zât',] a noted heresiarch of the third century. He was chosen Bishop of Antioch about 260 A.D., and soon provoked general censure by his rapacity, arrogance, and affectation of worldly pomp. He was also charged with heretical opinions respecting the divinity of Christ, and was deposed by a council in 269. According to Epiphanius, he denied the distinct personality of Christ. By the favour of Queen Zenobia, Paul kept possession of the church at Antioch until about 272 A.D. His opinions were afterwards maintained by a small sect called Pauliani.

Paul the Silentiary, a Greek poet, who was chief of the Silentiarii in the palace of Justinian. He wrote, about 562 A.D., a description of the church of Saint Sophia at Constantinople, in verse.

Paul Veronese. See CAGLIARI, (PAOLO.)

Pau'la, SAINT, a Roman lady, noted for ascetic piety, born in 347 A.D., was descended from the Scipios. She was a disciple of Saint Jerome. Died in Palestine in 404.

Paul'ding, (HIRAM,) an American rear-admiral, a son of John Paulding, noticed below, was born in Westchester county, New York, about 1800. He became a captain in 1844, and arrested Walker the filibuster at Punta Arenas in 1857. For this act he was censured by President Buchanan, who released Walker. In April, 1861, he was appointed commander of the navy-yard of Norfolk, and burned the shipping and other public property which it seemed impossible to defend. The ships-of-war had been scuttled before he took command there. He commanded the Brooklyn Navy-Yard from 1862 to 1865. Died October 20, 1878.

See HEADLEY, "Farragut and our Naval Commanders," 1867; GREELEY, "American Conflict," 1866.

Paulding, (JAMES KIRKE,) a popular American novelist and miscellaneous writer, born in Pawling, Dutchess county, New York, in August, 1779. He published in 1807, conjointly with Washington Irving, a series of witty and satirical papers, entitled "Salmagundi," which were greatly admired at the time. His satire entitled "The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan" appeared in 1816, and was followed by "The Backwoodsman," a poem, (1818,) "John Bull in America, or the New Munchausen," (1824,) "Merry Tales of the Three Wise Men of Gotham," (1826,) and "The Dutchman's Fireside," the most admired of his novels, (1831.) His more recent works are a "Life of Washington," and the novel entitled "The Old Continental," (1846.) Mr. Paulding was appointed in 1837 secretary of the navy by President Van Buren. Died in 1860.

Paulus, (L. ÆMILIUS,) [Fr. PAUL-ÉMILE, pōl à'mèl'; It. PAOLO EMILIO, pŏw'lo à-mee'le-o,] a Roman general of a patrician family, was consul for the first time in 219 B.C. He was again elected consul for the year 216, by the aristocratic party. Against his advice, his rash colleague, Terentius Varro, offered battle to Hannibal at Cannæ, where Æmilius Paulus was killed, in 216 B.C. His brave conduct on this occasion is applauded by Horace. ("Carmina," Lib. I., Ode 12.) His daughter ÆMILIA was the wife of Scipio the Great, surnamed Africanus.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxii. and xxiii.

Paulus, (LUCIUS ÆMILIUS,) a son of the preceding, was born about 230 B.C., and was the most celebrated member of his family. He was a fine specimen of the old Roman aristocracy, and was a brother-in-law of Scipio Africanus, the conqueror of Hannibal. Elected prætor for the year 191 B.C., he obtained as his province Farther Spain, where he defeated the Lusitani in a great battle. In the year 189 he returned to Rome, and in 182 was elected consul, after having been defeated at several elections. With a view to finish the Macedonian war, the people elected him consul in 168 B.C. He gained in the same year a decisive victory over Perseus at Pydna, and afterwards took that king prisoner. He returned to Rome in 167, and obtained the honour of a triumph, with the surname of MACEDONICUS. He died in 160 B.C. leaving a high reputation for honour and integrity. Plutarch has written his life and drawn a comparison between him and Timoleon. One of his sons was adopted by the son of the great Scipio above named, and became afterwards celebrated as Scipio Africanus the younger.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxxiv.–xl.; PLUTARCH, "Paulus Æmilius;" AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Viris illustribus."

Paulus, pŏw'lus, (PIETER,) a Dutch statesman, born at Axel in 1754. He was president of the Assembly which abolished the office of Stadtholder in 1795. He wrote a "Memoir on Equality among Men," (1792.) Died in 1796.

Pau'lus Ægine'ta, (ĕj-e-ne'tạ,) [Fr. PAUL D'ÉGINE, pōl dȧ'zhèn',] a celebrated Greek medical writer, of whose personal history little is known, except that he was born in the island of Ægina. He is supposed to have lived in the seventh century of our era. He travelled extensively, and wrote several medical works, one of which, called "De Re Medica Libri septem," is still extant. It is mostly compiled from Galen and other writers. The sixth book ("On Surgery") is the most valuable and original part of the work.

Paulus Æmilius. See EMILIO, (PAOLO.)

Pau'lus Di-ac'o-nus, [Fr. PAUL DIACRE, pōl de'-ȧkr',] ("Paul the Deacon,") a mediæval historian, sometimes called WARNEFRIDUS, was born at Friuli (Forum Julii) about 735 A.D. He passed some years at the court of Charlemagne. He wrote Latin verses, and a valuable "History of the Lombards," in a clear and elegant style. Died about 798 A.D.

Paunce'fote, (JULIAN,) LORD, an English diplomatist, was born at Preston Court, England, in 1828. He was called to the bar in 1852, served as attorney-general and chief justice of the supreme court in Hong-Kong, became under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1882, minister to the United States in 1889, and ambassador after 1893. He was raised to the peerage as Lord Pauncefote in 1899.

Pau-sā'nĭ-as, [Παυσανίας,] a Spartan general, was the son of Cleombrotus, and a nephew of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylæ. In 479 B.C. he became guardian of his cousin Pleistarchus, for whom he exercised the functions of royalty for several years. He commanded the Greek army which defeated the Persians under Mardonius at Platæa in 479. In 477 the confederate Greeks sent out a fleet under Pausanias, who captured Byzantium. Having formed ambitious and treasonable designs, he made secret overtures to the King of Persia. He also offended the allies by his arrogant and domineering conduct, and was recalled to Sparta. His intrigues with the Persian court were detected a few years later by the Ephori, who ordered his arrest. He then took refuge in a temple, where he died of starvation, about 468 B.C.

Pausanias, King of Sparta, was a son of Pleistonax, whom he succeeded in 444 B.C., being then an infant. During the contest between Thrasybu'lus and the Thirty Tyrants (403 B.C.) he intervened in favour of the former. Died about 380 B.C.

Pausanias, a Greek traveller and author, who flourished between 150 and 200 A.D. He is supposed to have been born in Lydia; but nothing is known respecting him except what we learn from his writings. He was the author of a valuable "Itinerary or Description of Greece," (Ἑλλάδος Περιήγησις.) His description of places is minute and accurate, but mainly relates to objects of antiquity and works of art. If he mentions mountains and rivers, it is chiefly for the sake of legends or myths connected with them. He describes pictures, statues, etc. with simplicity, and makes no pretensions to be a critic. His work is the more highly prized for this reason. "With the exception of Herodotus," says George Long, "there is no writer of antiquity who has comprehended so many valuable facts in a small volume. The work of Pausanias is full of matter,—mythological, historical, and artistic; nor does he omit matters physical and economical." His work has been translated into English by Thomas Taylor.

See KOENIG, "De Pausaniæ Fide et Auctoritate in Historia," etc., 1832; SIEBELIS, "Quæstio in Pausaniæ Periegetæ Patria," etc., 1819.

Pausias, pau'she-as, [Παυσίας,] an excellent Greek painter of Sicyon, flourished about 350 B.C. He was a pupil of Pamphilus, and a contemporary of Apelles. He excelled in painting in encaustic with the cestrum, (graving-tool.) Pliny calls him "primum in hoc genere nobilem." The favourite subjects of Pausias were small panel-pictures, chiefly of boys. He was the first who decorated the ceilings and walls of houses with encaustic paintings. Among his master-pieces was "The Sacrifice of an Ox," in which the effects of foreshortening and chiaroscuro were displayed with great success.

Pau'son, [Παύσων,] a Greek painter of uncertain epoch, is mentioned by Aristotle, who says that Polygnotus painted figures more beautiful than nature, Dionysius represented them as they are, and Pauson made them appear inferior to the reality.

Pautet, pō'tā', (JULES,) a French writer of prose and verse, born at Beaune in 1799; died in 1870.

Pauthier, pō'te-ā', (JEAN PIERRE GUILLAUME,) a French Orientalist, was born at Mamirolle in 1801. He published a French version of "Childe Harold," (1828–30,) "The Four Books of the Moral and Political Philosophy of the Chinese," (4th edition, 1852,) "La Chine," (1837,) a "History of the Political Relations of China with the Western Powers," (1859,) etc. Died in 1873.

It became noted for humourous sketches, particularly the "Peck's Bad Boy" series. He was mayor of Milwaukee 1890–91, and Governor of Wisconsin 1891–95.

Peck, (HARRY THURSTON,) editor, born at Stamford, Connecticut, in 1856. He graduated at Columbia College in 1881, became professor of Latin there, and editor of the "Bookman" in 1895. He wrote "The Semitic Theory of Creation," "The Personal Equation," "The Adventures of Mabel," etc., and edited "The International Cyclopædia," "Masterpieces of Literature," and other compilations.

Peck, (JESSE TRUESDELL,) D.D., LL.D., an American Methodist bishop, born at Middlefield, New York, April 4, 1811. He was principal of the Troy Conference Seminary 1841–48, president of Dickinson College 1848–52, and in 1872 was consecrated a bishop. He wrote several works on theological subjects. Died in 1883.

Peck, (JOHN J.,) an American general, born in Onondaga county, New York, in 1821, graduated at West Point in 1843. He commanded a brigade at Williamsburg and Fair Oaks in May, 1862, soon after which he was raised to the rank of major-general of volunteers. He repulsed General Longstreet, who attacked him at Suffolk, in April, 1863. Died April 21, 1878.

Peck, (JOHN MASON,) D.D., an American Baptist divine and missionary, born at Litchfield, Connecticut, in 1789. He was one of the founders of the American Baptist Home Mission Society in 1831, having previously edited "The Pioneer," the first Baptist journal of the West, (1829.) In 1835 he founded Shurtleff College, at Upper Alton, Illinois. He afterwards settled at Philadelphia as corresponding secretary and general agent of the American Baptist Publication Society. He wrote the "Life of Daniel Boone" in Sparks's "American Biography," and several other works. Died in 1858.

Pee'bles, (JAMES MARTIN,) an American author, born at Whittingham, Vermont, in 1822. He graduated in medicine, became a newspaper editor and proprietor, and was for four years president of the California College of Science. He became a spiritualist lecturer, and published "Seers of the Ages," "Immortality and our Homes Hereafter," "Three Journeys around the World," etc.

Peel, (FREDERICK,) a son of the statesman Sir Robert Peel, was born in London in 1823. He was elected to Parliament for Leominster in 1849, and re-elected for Bury in 1852 and 1859. In politics he is called Liberal Conservative. He was under-secretary for the colonies from 1852 to February, 1855, under-secretary of war from the latter date to 1857, and secretary to the treasury from 1860 to 1865.

Peel, (JONATHAN,) a British general, a younger son of the first Sir Robert, was born in 1799. He entered the army young, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general. In 1826 he was elected to Parliament for Norwich. He was surveyor-general of the ordnance from 1841 to 1846, and secretary at war in the Derby ministry from February, 1858, to June, 1859, and again from July, 1866, to March, 1867. Died February 13, 1879.

Peel, (Sir ROBERT,) an English manufacturer and millionaire, born near Lancaster in 1750, was the father of Robert Peel, prime minister. He became in 1773 a partner in a large manufactory of cotton at Bury. By his sagacity, enterprise, and remarkable aptitude for business, he amassed an immense fortune. He represented Tamworth in Parliament from 1790 to 1820, and was a supporter of the ministry and Tory party. He had six sons and five daughters. Died in 1830.

Peel, (Sir ROBERT,) a celebrated English statesman, born near Bury, in Lancashire, on the 5th of February, 1788, was the eldest son of the preceding. He was educated at Harrow (where Lord Byron was his classfellow) and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he gained the honour of "double first-class,"—i.e. pre-eminence both in classics and mathematics. He left college in 1808, and entered Parliament as a member for Cashel, and a supporter of the Tory ministry, in 1809. In January, 1810, he seconded the address to the throne, and made his first speech. He was appointed under-secretary for the colonies in 1811, and chief secretary for Ireland in 1812. In 1815 he challenged O'Connell for offensive remarks in a public speech; but the intended duel was prevented by the police. His opponents nicknamed him ORANGE PEEL, in allusion to his hostility to the Catholics. He made a speech against the Roman Catholic claims in 1817. In 1818 he was elected to Parliament for the University of Oxford, in preference to Canning, and resigned his office of secretary. He succeeded Mr. Horner as chairman of the Bullion committee in 1819, and acquired a high reputation as a financier by procuring the passage of an act for the resumption of cash payments. He married in 1820 Julia, a daughter of General Sir John Floyd.

In January, 1822, he became secretary for the home department in the ministry of Lord Liverpool. For several years ensuing, Canning and Peel were the most able and prominent members of the ministry. Although Peel was less brilliant as an orator than his colleague, he was more solid and practical, and had equal or greater influence with his party. When Canning became prime minister, in April, 1827, Mr. Peel retired from office. He accepted the place of home secretary in the new ministry formed by the Duke of Wellington in January, 1828, and made a powerful speech in favour of Catholic emancipation (which he had long opposed) in March, 1829. By his change on this question he lost his seat as representative of Oxford, in 1829. The obstinate resistance of the Tory ministry to parliamentary reform caused them to be defeated and driven from power in November, 1830. Earl Grey then formed a Whig ministry, and Sir Robert became the leader of the opposition. At the death of his father, in 1830, he inherited an immense fortune and the title of baronet. He opposed the Reform bill, (1831–32,) but declined to co-operate with Wellington in the formation of a new ministry when Lord Grey resigned, in 1832. In 1833 he was elected to Parliament for Tamworth, which he continued to represent until 1850.

Sir Robert at this period was the recognized leader of the Conservative party, which he had organized, and the principles of which were modified Toryism. The Whig ministry having been dismissed, Peel and Wellington united to form a cabinet, in which the former became first lord of the treasury, (i.e. prime minister,) in December, 1834. Failing to obtain the support of a majority of the new Parliament elected at this period, Sir Robert was compelled to resign, in April, 1835, and was succeeded by Lord Melbourne. On the resignation of Melbourne, in May, 1839, Sir Robert was sent for by the queen, but he failed to become prime minister, because he insisted on the removal of certain ladies of the bed-chamber. The general election of 1841 gave the Conservatives a large majority in Parliament. Lord Melbourne resigned in August of that year, and was succeeded by Sir Robert Peel. In the new cabinet Lord Lyndhurst was lord chancellor, Lord Aberdeen foreign secretary, Lord Stanley colonial secretary, Sir James Graham home secretary, and Lord Ellenborough secretary at war. Peel himself was first lord of the treasury. The important events of his administration were the settlement of the questions of the corn-laws, tariff, and income-tax. In 1842 he proposed a sliding-scale, according to which the duty on grain should be reduced in proportion as the price increased. This bill became a law. He imposed an income-tax of 7*d.* in the pound to supply the deficit in the revenue, and passed a new tariff bill, by which many articles were admitted free and the duties on others were reduced, (1842.) A powerful pressure against the duty on breadstuffs was produced by the Anti-Corn-Law League, whose interests were advocated by Cobden and Bright in public speeches. The case was rendered more urgent by the potato-rot in Ireland in 1845. In November, 1845, Sir Robert announced himself in favour of the repeal of the corn-laws; but some of his colleagues opposed the measure. Peel then resigned, and Lord John Russell was called to form a new cabinet, but did not succeed. About the 20th of December, Sir Robert resumed office with his former colleagues, except Lord Stanley, who retired. The Tory party was divided on this question into Peelites and Protectionists. By the united votes of the Peelites and Liberals, the corn-laws were repealed, after an eloquent speech by Sir Robert in favour of the repeal, in January, 1846. Having been defeated on the Irish Coercion bill, he resigned, June 29, 1846, and was succeeded by Lord John Russell. He had acquired great popularity, which continued unabated, and he would probably have been called again to the direction of affairs if he had lived a few years longer. On the 29th of June, 1850, he was thrown from his horse and received injuries of which he died on July 2 of that year.

Peel, (Sir ROBERT,) the eldest son of the preceding, was born in London in 1822. He was returned to Parliament for Tamworth in 1850, and voted with the Liberal party. In 1855 he was appointed one of the lords of the Admiralty by Lord Palmerston. Having resigned this place in 1857, he became secretary for Ireland, without a seat in the cabinet, in 1861. He retired from that office about 1864, and voted with the Tories against the Reform bill in April, 1866. Died May 9, 1895.

Peele, peel, (GEORGE,) an English dramatist, born in Devonshire, graduated at Oxford in 1579. He became a resident of London, and had the title of city poet. His talent was much inferior to that of Marlowe. Among his plays are "The Old Wives Tale" and "The Battle of Alcazar." Died about 1598. His works were published by Dyce in 1828, with a memoir of his life.

Peerlkamp, pār'kămp, (HOFMAN PIETER,) a Dutch philologist and critic, born at Groningen in 1786. He published several biographical works in Latin, and valuable editions of Xenophon of Ephesus, Horace's "Odes," and "Letters to Piso." Died in 1865.

Peet, (HARVEY PRINDLE,) LL.D., born in Litchfield county, Connecticut, in 1794, became president of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb in New York, (1845.) He published a "Course of Instruction," "Scripture Lessons," and other works for deaf-mutes. Died in 1873.

Peet, (STEPHEN DENISON,) born at Euclid, Ohio, in 1830, became a pastor of Congregational churches in Ohio, Wisconsin, etc., and established in 1878 "The American Antiquarian." He was an ardent archæologist, and wrote "Mound-Builders," "Animal Effigies," "Cliff-Dwellers," etc.

Pef'fer, (WILLIAM ALFRED,) born in Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, in 1831. He served in the civil war, became an editor in Kansas, was elected to the State senate in 1874, and by the People's party to the United States Senate in 1891. He was defeated as prohibition candidate for governor in 1898. He published "Peffer's Tariff Manual." "The Farmer's Side," "The Way Out," and other works.

Pégase. See PEGASUS.

Pĕg'ą-sus, [Gr. Πήγασος; Fr. PÉGASE, pą'găz',] a winged horse of classic mythology, was supposed to be the offspring of Neptune and Medusa. The poets relate that he carried Bellerophon in his fight with Chimæra, that with a stroke of his hoof he produced the fountain Hippocrene on Mount Helicon, that he was the favourite of the Muses, and that he finally became a constellation in the heavens.

Peignot, pąn'yo', (ÉTIENNE GABRIEL,) a learned French bibliographer, born at Arc-en-Barrois in 1767. He was principal of colleges at Vesoul and Dijon. He wrote many antiquarian treatises, biographies, and works on bibliography. His "Dictionary of Bibliology" ("Dictionnaire raisonné de Bibliologie," 2 vols., 1802) is said to be important. Died in 1849.

From 1867 to 1874 he was superintendent of the coast survey. Died Oct. 6, 1880.

Peirce, (BRADFORD KINNEY,) D.D., a Methodist clergyman, born at Royalton, Vermont, February 3, 1819. He graduated at Wesleyan University in 1841, and became prominent as a preacher, editor, and philanthropist. Among his books are "The Eminent Dead," "Trials of an Inventor," "Half-Century with Juvenile Delinquents," "The Young Shetlander," etc.

Peirce, (CHARLES SANDERS,) an American author, born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1839. He graduated at Harvard, published "Photometric Researches," "History of Science," and many scientific papers, and was elected a member of the National Academy of Sciences. He edited "Studies in Logic" by members of the Johns Hopkins University, adding largely to it, and was a large contributor to the Century Dictionary.

Peiresc, de, deh pą'rĕsk', (NICOLAS CLAUDE Fabri—fą'brĕ',) an eminent French antiquary, scholar, and patron of learning, was born at Beaugensier, in Provence, in 1580. He studied law at Padua, and became a counsellor of the parliament of Aix. He was an intimate friend of Gassendi. In visits to Italy, England, etc., he collected many books, medals, and specimens of nature and art, which he freely distributed to his friends. He maintained an active correspondence with many French and foreign savants. He wrote to his friends at Rome in favour of Galileo when the latter was in prison. Many of his letters have been published. It was at Peiresc's suggestion that Grotius wrote his work "De Jure Belli et Pacis." Died at Aix in 1637.

Pe-lā'ğĭ-us, [Gr. Πελαγίος; Fr. PÉLAGE, pą'lăzh',] the founder of the sect of Pelagians, or rather the chief advocate of a system of doctrines called Pelagianism, was born probably in Britain. He began to propagate his doctrines at Rome about 400 A.D., and formed a friendship with Celestius, who became his ardent disciple.

He was an admirer of Origen, and an adversary of Saint Augustine in relation to grace and election. Pelagius rejected the dogmas of original sin and absolute predestination. He maintained that the effects of Adam's first sin were confined to himself, and that man's salvation depends on his own exertions. He was condemned by several councils, and was banished from Italy in 418. The eminent purity of his life was freely admitted by his opponents. A system called Semi-Pelagianism prevailed widely in the middle ages, and has many adherents at the present day. As the numerous works of Pelagius are nearly all lost, it is difficult to ascertain exactly what doctrines he taught. His adversaries complained of the haze of subtle dialectics with which he involved every subject of dispute. Among his extant works is a "Commentary on the Epistles of Saint Paul."

Pelet, pęh-lā', (JEAN JACQUES GERMAIN,) BARON, a French general, born at Toulouse about 1778. He served with distinction as aide-de-camp of Massena in Italy, Austria, and Portugal, (1805–12,) and commanded a brigade at Waterloo. In 1830 he became a lieutenant-general. He was appointed a senator in 1852. He published "Memoirs of the War of 1809," (4 vols., 1824,) and other able military works. Died in 1858.

Pelet de la Lozère, pęh-lā' dęh lă lo'zaiR', (JEAN,) COMTE, a French legislator, born at Saint-Jean-du-Gard in 1759, was distinguished for his wisdom and moderation. He was elected to the Convention in 1792, and to the Council of Five Hundred (by seventy-one departments) in 1795. During the empire he was councillor of state. Died in 1842.

His son, PRIVAT JOSEPH CLARAMOND, born in 1785, was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1827. He distinguished himself as an orator of the Left Centre. He was minister of finance in 1840. Died in 1871.

Peletier, pęl-te-ā', sometimes written Pelletier, (JACQUES,) a poet and mathematician, born at Mans, in France, in 1517. He lived at many places, and followed various pursuits. In 1572 he became principal of the College of Mans. He translated Horace's "De Arte Poetica" into verse, (1544,) and wrote original poems of some merit. Died in 1582.

Peletier, Le, lęh pęl-te-ā', (CLAUDE,) a French magistrate, born in Paris in 1630 or 1631. He was provost of the merchants in 1668, and constructed the quai in Paris which bears his name. In 1683 he succeeded Colbert as controller-general of finance. He found himself unequal to the task of raising funds for a long war, and resigned in 1689. Voltaire calls him a good and just man. Died in 1711.

Peletier de Sousi, Le, lęh pęl-te-ā' dęh soo'ze', (MICHEL,) a brother of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1640. He spoke many languages, ancient and modern, and wrote memoirs on medals and inscriptions. He served as intendant of finance from 1683 to 1701, and was chosen a member of the council of regency at the death of Louis XIV. Died in 1725.

Peleus, pee'lūs or pee'le-us, [Gr. Πηλεύς; Fr. PÉLÉE, pà'lā',] King of Thessaly, was a son of Æacus, and married the sea-nymph Thetis, by whom he became the father of Achilles. The marriage of Peleus and Thetis is said to have been attended by all the gods and goddesses except Discord. According to tradition, he took part in the Argonautic expedition, but was prevented by his great age from joining in the siege of Troy.

Pe'leus, [Fr. PILIEU, pe'le-uh',] (JULIEN,) a French lawyer, born at Angers. He was appointed councillor of state and historiographer by Henry IV., and wrote a "History of Henry the Great," (4 vols., 1616.) Died about 1625.

Pelham. See NEWCASTLE, DUKE OF.

Pelham, pĕl'ăm, (HENRY,) an English statesman, born in 1694, was a brother of the Duke of Newcastle. He became paymaster of the army in 1730, and an opponent of Walpole. On the defeat of Walpole, in 1742, he obtained the office of chancellor of the exchequer. A rivalry between him and Lord Carteret resulted in the removal of the latter in 1743 or 1744, after which Pelham and his brother were the chief ministers until 1754. "Henry Pelham," says Macaulay, "was by no means a contemptible person. His understanding was that of Walpole on a somewhat smaller scale. Though not a brilliant orator, he was, like his master, a good debater, a good parliamentary tactician, a good man of business. . . . For the first time since the accession of the Stuarts, there was no opposition." Died in 1754.

Pelham, (HENRY FRANCIS,) an English historian and educator, born in 1846. He became Camden professor of ancient history at Oxford in 1889, and president of Trinity College, Oxford, in 1897. He wrote "Outlines of Roman History," (1890,) "The Roman Frontier System," (1895,) etc.

Pelham, (THOMAS,) Earl of Chichester, was born in or near London in 1756. He was elected about 1780 to the House of Commons, in which he voted with the Tories. He was home secretary from April, 1801, to 1803, and inherited the title of Earl of Chichester at the death of his father, in 1805. Died in 1826.

Pelhestre, pęh-lĕstR', (PIERRE,) a learned French ecclesiastic and writer, born at Rouen in 1635; died in 1710.

Pe-lī'a-dēs, (singular, Pe'lĭ-as,) a name applied to the daughters of PELIAS, which see.

Pe'lĭ-as, [Gr. Πελίας; Fr. PÉLIAS, pà'le'ăs',] a son of Neptune and Tyro or of Cretheus and Tyro, was a brother of Neleus. He usurped the throne of Iolcos from Æson, a son of Cretheus, and sent Jason to Colchis to bring the golden fleece. He was the father of Acastus, Alcestis, and several other daughters. The poets relate that Pelias was cut to pieces by his daughters, called PELIADES, at the instigation of Medea, who promised to restore him to youth.

Pélissier, pà'le'se-ā', (AMABLE JEAN JACQUES,) Duc de Malakoff, (dęh măl'ăkof',) a French general, born at Maromme (Seine-Inférieure) in 1794. He entered the army in 1815, and served as aide-de-camp of General Durrieu in the Morea in 1828–29. About the end of 1839 he was sent, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, to Algeria, where he took part in many actions. He commanded the left wing at Isly, in 1844, and in 1845 fixed an indelible stain upon his memory by suffocating a party of Arabs in a cavern, at the mouth of which he ordered a large fire to be built. In 1850 he became a general of division. He was Governor-General of Algeria ad interim in 1851. In January, 1855, he was ordered to the Crimea, to command the first corps of the army which co-operated with the British in the siege of Sebastopol. He succeeded Canrobert as general-in-chief on the 16th of May, 1855. A victory was gained by the allies on the Tchernaia in August, and the French carried by storm the fort of Malakoff on the 8th of September. For this success Pélissier received a marshal's bâton in 1855, and the title of Duke of Malakoff in 1856. He was ambassador to England in 1858, and during the war in Italy in 1859 he commanded the army of observation which defended the eastern frontier. In November, 1860, he became Governor-General of Algeria. Died in 1864.

Pell, (JOHN,) an eminent English mathematician, born in Sussex in 1610, studied at Cambridge and Oxford. He became professor at Amsterdam in 1643, and was sent by Cromwell as agent to the Protestant Swiss cantons in 1654. He returned home in 1658, became rector of Fobbing, Essex, in 1661, and rector of Laingdon in 1673. He published a refutation of Longomontanus's discourse "On the True Measure of the Circle," ("De vera Circuli Mensura," 1644,) an "Idea of the Mathematics," and other works. It was to Pell that Newton first explained his invention of fluxions. Died in 1685.

See MONTUCLA, "Histoire des Mathématiques."

Pellat, pà'lä', (CHARLES AUGUSTE,) an able French jurist, born at Grenoble in 1793. He obtained the chair of Pandects in Paris in 1829, and published several successful works on Roman law. Died Nov. 14, 1871.

Pellegrin, pĕl'grăn', (SIMON JOSEPH,) ABBÉ, a French poet and dramatist, born at Marseilles in 1663. He gained a prize of the French Academy for poetry in 1704. His best works are "The New World," a comedy, (1723,) and "Pélopée," a tragedy, (1733,) which were successful. Died at Paris in 1745.

Pellegrini, pĕl-lä-gree'nee, (ANTONIO,) an Italian painter of history, born at Venice in 1675. He worked in England and Paris, and settled at Venice. Among his master-pieces is "The Brazen Serpent." "He was ingenious," says the "Biographie Universelle," "and painted with great facility." Died in 1741.

Pellegrini, (ANTONIO,) an Italian cardinal, born at Rome, August 11, 1812, was created a cardinal-deacon in 1877. Died in 1887.

Pellegrini, (CAMILLO,) an Italian historian, born at Capua in 1598. He spent much time in collecting ancient documents for the history of Italy, and published a valuable "History of the Princes of Lombardy," ("Historia Principum Longobardorum," 1643.) Died in 1663.

Pellegrini, (DOMENICO,) an architect and engraver, born in 1541, was a brother of Pellegrino, noticed below. He designed the palace de Magnani at Bologna, and other fine edifices of that city. His etchings are prized by amateurs. Died in 1582.

Pellegrini, (GIUSEPPE LUIGI,) an Italian poet and Jesuit, born at Verona in 1718, was distinguished as a pulpit orator. He published "Latin and Italian Poems," ("Poesie Latine ed Italiane," 1791.) Died in 1799.

Pellegrini, (PELLEGRINO,) called also TIBALDI, tebăl'dee, an eminent painter and architect, born in the Milanese in 1527. He studied in Rome, and appears to have taken Michael Angelo as his model. He acquired a grandeur of style which was less extravagant than that of Michael Angelo. Among his best paintings are the frescos in the Poggi Chapel, representing John the Baptist baptizing, and other subjects. He was appointed in 1570 chief architect of the Duomo (cathedral) of Milan, and designed the façade of that great Gothic structure, which was commenced about 1387. His design was censured by many artists, but was partially executed. He worked for Philip II. of Spain in the Escurial, both as painter and architect. He died at Milan about 1595 or 1600.

Pelleport, pĕl'por', (PIERRE,) VICOMTE, a French general, born in Haute-Garonne in 1773. He fought at Jena, (1806,) at Eylau, (1807,) obtained the rank of colonel at Essling, and the title of baron at Wagram, (1809.) Died in 1855.

Pellerin, pĕl'răn', (JOSEPH,) a French numismatist and linguist, born near Versailles in 1684. He became commissioner of the navy in 1718, and chief clerk some years later. He formed a cabinet of 32,500 medals, which is said to have been the richest that ever belonged to a private person, and published a description of them, entitled "Collection of Medals of Kings, Nations, and Cities," ("Recueil de Médailles de Rois, Peuples et Villes," 10 vols., 1762–78.) He adopted an improved system of classification. Died in 1782.

Pellet, pà'lä', (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a French poet and advocate, born at Épinal in 1782; died in 1830.

Pelletan, pĕl'tăn', (EUGÈNE,) an able French littérateur, born in Charente-Inférieure in 1813. His father was a Protestant minister. He was connected with the "Presse" and other papers, and wrote a number of popular works, among which are "The Profession of Faith of the Nineteenth Century," (1853,) "The Pastor of the Desert," (1855,) "The New Babylon," (1862,) and "Elisée," (1877.) He was elected to the corps législatif in 1869, became a member of the provisional government in September, 1870, and a senator in 1876. Died in 1884.

Pelletan, (PHILIPPE JEAN,) a French surgeon of high reputation, was born in Paris in 1747. He succeeded Desault as surgeon-in-chief of the Hôtel-Dieu in Paris, and was consulting surgeon to Napoleon I. He lectured in Paris about thirty years, with such eloquence that he was called the "Chrysostom of surgeons." Died in 1829.

Pelletan, (PIERRE,) a son of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1782, and was a distinguished physician. He became professor of physique médicale at Paris in 1823. In 1843 he resigned this chair. He published a "Dictionary of Medical Chemistry," (2 vols., 1823.) Died in 1846.

Pelletier. See PELETIER, LE, (CLAUDE.)

Pelletier, pĕl'te-à', (BERTRAND,) an eminent French chemist, born at Bayonne in 1761. He became professor of chemistry at the Polytechnic School in Paris in 1795, and a member of the Institute. He wrote for the "Annales de Chimie," and made some important discoveries. "He showed himself a man of genius," says Fournier-Pescay, "in his researches on phosphorus and on its combinations with metals." Died in 1797. His collected works were published, under the title of "Memoirs and Observations," (2 vols.,) in 1798.

Pelletier, pĕl'te-à, (CASPAR,) a Dutch physician and botanist, was born at Middelburg; died in 1659.

Pelletier, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French general, born at Éclaron (Haute-Marne) in 1777. He became general of brigade in 1809, obtained command of the artillery, and served with credit at Moskwa, (1812.) Died in 1862.

Pelletier, (PIERRE JOSEPH,) a chemist, born in Paris in 1788, was a son of Bertrand, noticed above. He displayed a rare talent for observation and analysis, and discovered several vegetable salifiable bases. The important discovery of quinine (1820) was made by Pelletier and Caventou, who was his associate. For this service the Academy of Sciences gave him a prize of ten thousand francs in 1827. He published a "Memoir on Quinine," (1821,) and other works. Died in 1842.

Pel'lew, (GEORGE,) D.D., a younger son of Lord Exmouth, was born in 1793. He became Dean of Norwich in 1828. Among his works is "The Seven Ages of a Christian Life," (1855.) Died October 13, 1866.

Pellican, pel'le-kăn', [Lat. PELLICA'NUS; Ger. KÜRSCHNER, kürsh'nẹr,] (CONRAD,) a learned Reformer and biblical critic, born at Ruffach, in Alsace, in 1478. He took the monastic vows, learned Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and became superior of the convent at Ruffach about 1517. Having been converted to the doctrines of Luther, he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Zurich in 1526. He was intimate with Erasmus. Among his works are Latin Commentaries on the Bible, (5 vols. fol., 1534–38,) which are highly esteemed. "Pellican," says Richard Simon, "is more exact than the other Protestants. . . . He aimed to be useful to his readers rather than to display his rabbinage." He also published a Hebrew Grammar. Died in 1556.

Pellicer, pĕl-ye-thaiR', (José de Ossau—dà ossŏw′,] a Spanish historian, born at Saragossa in 1602; died in 1679.

Pellicer, (JUAN ANTONIO,) a Spanish antiquary, born at Valencia in 1738. He wrote "Ensayo de una Biblioteca de Traductores Españoles," ("Library of Spanish Translations," 1778,) and published a good edition of "Don Quixote," (1797.) Died in 1806.

Pellicier or Pellissier, pȧ'le'se-ȧ', (GUILLAUME,) a French diplomatist, born in Languedoc about 1490. He became Bishop of Montpellier, and was employed in important missions by Francis I. His vast erudition is extolled by De Thou and Turnebus. Died in 1568.

Pellico, pel'le-ko, (SILVIO,) an Italian poet, born at Saluzzo, Piedmont, in 1788. He became in 1810 teacher of French in a college of Milan, where he formed a friendship with Ugo Foscolo and Monti. He produced "Francesca da Rimini," a tragedy, which was performed with great applause. In Milan he became acquainted with Lord Byron, Madame de Staël, and Lord Brougham. He was the principal founder of "Il Conciliatore," a literary periodical, first issued in 1818, which was quickly suppressed by the Austrian government. In October, 1820, he was arrested as a member of a secret society, and in 1822 was condemned to imprisonment for fifteen years carcere duro. He was confined in the citadel of Spielberg, at Brünn, in Moravia, until August, 1830, and then released. He afterwards wrote a narrative of his sufferings, entitled "My Prisons," ("Le mie Prigioni," 1831,) which excited great sympathy and was translated into all the languages of Europe. His prose treatise "On the Duties of Man" is praised for its good morality. Died at Turin in 1854.

Pellisson, pȧ'le'sȯN', or Pellisson-Fontanier, pȧ'-le'sȯN' fȯN'tȧ'ne-ȧ', (PAUL,) a French author, born, of Protestant parents, at Béziers in 1624. He wrote a "History of the French Academy," (1653,) which obtained such success that this society nominated him a titular member and voted that he should be admitted to the first vacant seat. In 1657 he became chief clerk of Fouquet, minister of finance. He was confined for four years (1661–65) in the Bastille on account of his connection with Fouquet. Having been selected by Louis XIV. to write the history of his reign, he abjured Protestantism in 1670, entered into holy orders, and obtained several benefices. He wrote a "History of Louis XIV.," (3 vols., 1749,) and other works. His writings were more admired in his own time than at present. Died in 1693.

See FÉNELON, "Éloge de Pellisson;" VOLTAIRE, "Siècle de Louis XIV."

Pelloutier, pȧ'loo'te-ȧ', (SIMON,) a French historian, born at Leipsic in 1694. He became minister of a Protestant church at Berlin in 1725, and a member of the Academy of Sciences of that city in 1743. His chief work is a "History of the Celts, Gauls, and Germans from Fabulous Times to the Capture of Rome by the Gauls," (in French, 2 vols., 1740–50,) which, says the "Journal des Savants," "is extremely curious and agreeable." Died at Berlin in 1757.

See HAAG, "La France protestante."

Pe-lop'I-das, [Gr. Πελοπίδας,] an eminent Theban statesman and general, was a son of Hippoclus. He inherited a large fortune, of which he made a liberal use, and became an intimate and constant friend of Epaminondas, who saved his life at the battle of Mantinea, (385 B.C.) As a leader of the popular party, he went into exile when the Spartans made themselves masters of Thebes, in 382. He was the master-spirit of the small band of patriots who surprised by night and expelled the Spartans and aristocrats from Thebes in 379 B.C. "It is not easy," says Plutarch, "to find an instance so remarkable of the few overcoming the many, merely by courage and conduct. . . . The war which humbled the pride of the Spartans and deprived them of empire took its rise from that night." Pelopidas was chosen general-in-chief, and in 375 gained at Tegyræ a decisive victory over the Spartans, who then lost their prestige of invincibility. He was captain of the Sacred band at the battle of Leuctra, where he gained as much honour, says Plutarch, as Epaminondas, the commander-in-chief. In 369 B.C. Pelopidas and his friend commanded jointly an army which entered Peloponnesus, forced Argos and Arcadia to renounce the alliance of the Spartans, and ravaged a large part of Laconia in a winter campaign. (See EPAMINONDAS.) He acted as mediator between two sons of Amyntas, King of Macedon, and carried as a hostage to Thebes another prince, who was afterwards famous as Philip of Macedon. Having been sent as ambassador to Persia in 367, he was received with great honour by the king and courtiers, who said, "This is the man who deprived the Spartans of the empire of the sea and land;" and he induced Artaxerxes to recognize the liberty of all the Greek states. He commanded an expedition against Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, in a battle with whom he was killed in 364 B.C., as he too rashly urged the retreating enemy.

See "Life of Pelopidas," by PLUTARCH, who compares him to Marcellus, and says that Pelopidas was "inclined to every virtue;" CORNELIUS NEPOS, "Pelopidas;" THIRLWALL, "History of Greece."

Pe'lops, [Gr. Πέλοψ; Fr. PÉLOPS, pȧ'lops',] a demi-god of Greek mythology, said to have been a son of Tantalus, a grandson of Jupiter, and a king of Pisa. Among his children were Atreus and Thyestes, whose mother was Hippodami'a, a daughter of Œnomaus. (See ŒNOMAUS.) The poets relate that Tantalus once entertained the gods at his house, and offered them the flesh of Pelops, whom he killed and boiled, that all the guests refused to partake of that dish, except Ceres, who ate one shoulder, and that Pelops was restored to life by Mercury, with an ivory shoulder in place of that which was devoured. Tradition adds that during the siege of Troy an oracle declared that this city could not be taken unless one of the bones of Pelops was brought to the camp of the Greeks. According to another legend, the Palladium at Troy was made of the bones of Pelops. The southern peninsula of Greece is supposed to have derived from him the name Peloponnesus, (or "island of Pelops.")

Pelouze, pęh-looz', (THÉOPHILE JULES,) a French chemist, born at Valognes (Manche) in 1807, was a pupil of Gay-Lussac. He obtained a chair of chemistry at Lille in 1830, soon after which he became the assistant (suppléant) of Gay-Lussac in the Polytechnic School. He was admitted into the Institute in 1837, and was appointed president of the Commission des Monnaies (or director of the Mint) in 1848. His labours and memoirs place him in the first rank of contemporary chemists. Pelouze and Frémy published a "Treatise on Chemistry," (6 vols., 1853–56.) Died in 1867.

Pels, pĕls, (ANDREAS,) a Dutch poet, who founded a school or literary society which favoured the imitation of French models. He wrote "The Death of Dido," a tragedy, (1668,) and translated into Dutch verse Horace's "Art of Poetry," (1667.) Died in 1681.

Peltan, de, dęh pĕl'tȧn, or Pelte, pel'tęh, [Lat. PELTA'NUS,] (THÉODORE ANTOINE,) a Flemish Jesuit, born at Pelte. He wrote a "Commentary on the Book of Proverbs," and other works. Died in 1584.

Peltanus. See PELTAN.

Peltier, pĕl'te-a', or Pelletier, (JEAN GABRIEL,) a French journalist, born at Nantes. He began to issue in London, in 1800, "L'Ambigu," in which he attacked Bonaparte with virulence. He was tried for libel in 1803, was defended in a famous speech by Sir James Mackintosh, and was sentenced to pay a small fine. Died in Paris in 1825.

Pelzel, pĕlt'sęl, (FRANS MARTIN,) a Bohemian historian, born at Reichenau in 1735, wrote a "History of Bohemia," (1774,) and other works. Died in 1801.

Pem'bęr-tŏn, (EBENEZER,) an able American divine, born about 1672, preached in Boston. Died in 1717.

Pemberton, (EBENEZER,) LL.D., an American teacher, born in 1746. He was tutor at Princeton College, and at Phillips Academy, Andover, Massachusetts. Died in Boston in 1835.

Pem'bęr-tŏn, (HENRY,) an English chemist, anatomist, and geometer, born in London in 1694, was a pupil and friend of Boerhaave. He became a professor of physic in Gresham College, (Oxford,) where he gave lectures on chemistry, (published in 1771.) Among his works are a "View of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy," (1728,) and "Lectures on Physiology," (1733.) He edited Newton's "Principia," (1726.) Died in 1771.

Pemberton, (JOHN C.,) an American general, born in Pennsylvania about 1818, graduated at West Point in 1837. He served in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) became a captain, and resigned his commission in April, 1861. Having taken arms against the Union, he obtained the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanded at Vicksburg during the long siege of that place. He died July 13, 1881.

Pemberton, (MAX,) an English novelist, born at Birmingham in 1863. He became editor of "Cassell's Magazine" in 1896. He published "The Diary of a Scoundrel," (1891,) "The Iron Pirate," (1893,) "A Gentleman's Gentleman," (1896,) etc.

Pemberton, (T. EDGAR,) an English novelist, born at Birmingham Heath, July 1, 1849. He inherited extensive business interests. He has published "Charles Lysaght," (1873,) "Under Pressure," (1874,) "Dickens's London," (1875,) "A Very Old Question," (1877,) "Born to Blush Unseen," (1879,) and a number of farces.

Pena, pẹh-nä', (PIERRE,) a French botanist of the sixteenth century, was born at Narbonne, or in the diocese of Aix. He was intimate with Lobel, to whom he furnished materials for his work.

Peñalosa, de, dä pän-yä-lo'sä, (Don JUAN,) a Spanish painter, born at Baeza in 1581; died in 1636.

Pe-nā'tēz, [Fr. PÉNATES, pá'nät',] the household gods of the Romans, so called, probably, because their images were kept in the penetralia, the innermost part or centre of the house. The number of these gods or genii was indefinite. The Lares were included among the Penates, and were sometimes represented as identical with them. Vesta was regarded as one of the Penates, which, according to some authors, were personifications of the powers of nature.

Pencz or Pentz, pẽnts, written also Pens and Peins, (GREGOR,) a German painter and engraver, was born at Nuremberg about 1500. Among his master-pieces are a "Crucifixion," in the gallery at Augsburg, and a "Judith," in the Pinakothek at Munich. His engravings are numerous and of great merit. Died about 1554.

Pen'der, (Sir JOHN,) a British telegraphic promoter, was born in Dumbartonshire in 1816. He took an active part in financiering the first Atlantic cable, and the success of the second cable was largely due to him. He followed it by organizing other cable companies, which in time developed into a world system. Submarine telegraphy was largely indebted to him for its success. Died in 1896.

Pendleton, pen'dẹl-tọn, (EDMUND,) an eminent American statesman and judge, born in Virginia in 1721. He was elected to the General Congress in 1774 and in 1775. In 1776 he was president of the Virginia Convention, and was the author of the resolutions by which that body instructed their delegates in Congress to vote for a declaration of independence. He was appointed presiding judge of the court of appeals about 1779. He was president of the convention which met in Virginia in 1788 to consider the new Constitution of the United States, and he advocated the adoption of the same. His ability as a debater was highly extolled by Thomas Jefferson. Died at Richmond in 1803.

Pendleton, (GEORGE H.,) an American politician, a son of Nathaniel Greene Pendleton, formerly a member of Congress, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in July, 1825. He became a lawyer, and was elected a member of the Senate of Ohio in 1854. He represented the first district of Ohio in the National House of Representatives from December, 1857, till March, 1865. He acted in Congress with the Democrats who opposed the coercion of the secessionists, and was nominated as candidate for Vice-President of the United States by the Democratic Convention in August, 1864. He received twenty-one electoral votes out of two hundred and thirty-three, which was the whole number. About 1867 he began to advocate the payment of the public debt in paper money, —"greenbacks." As a candidate for the Presidency he received, at the National Democratic Convention, July 8, 1868, one hundred and fifty-six and one-half votes out of three hundred and seventeen, on the eighth ballot. He was the Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio in 1869, but was not elected. In 1885 he was appointed United States minister to Germany. Died Nov. 24, 1889.

Pe-nel'o-pe, [Gr. Πηνελόπη or Πενελόπη; Fr. PÉNÉLOPE, pá'ná'lop',] the wife of Ulysses, King of Ithaca, and a cousin of Helen, was renowned for conjugal fidelity. During the long absence of her husband she evaded the importunity of her suitors by a promise to decide which she would accept when she had finished a shroud for the aged Laertes. She ravelled at night what she had woven by day, and thus postponed the decision until the return of Ulysses. She was the mother of Telemachus.

Pen'gelly, (WILLIAM,) F.R.S., F.G.S., an English geologist, was born in 1812, and became a schoolmaster at Torquay. He won fame in anthropology by his admirable explorations of the Brixham Cave and Kent's Hole. Died in 1894.

Penguilly l'Haridon, de, dẽh pôn'gẽ'ye' lä're'dôn', (OCTAVE,) a painter, born in Paris in 1811; died in 1870.

Penhouet, pẽh-noo'ä', (ARMAND LOUIS BON MAUDET,) a French antiquary, born in Bretagne in 1764. He wrote "Researches on Bretagne," (1814,) and other works. Died in 1839.

Pénicaud, pá'ne'kō', (PIERRE,) a French enameller and painter on glass, born in 1515, worked at Limoges. He was an able artist.

Pen'ick, (CHARLES CLIFTON,) D.D., an American bishop, born in Charlotte county, Virginia, December 9, 1843, was educated at Hampden-Sidney College, served from 1861 to 1865 as an officer of the Confederate army, graduated at the theological seminary near Alexandria, was ordained a priest of the Episcopal Church in 1870, and in 1877 was consecrated Bishop of Cape Palmas, in Liberia. He resigned the episcopate in 1883.

Pen'ing-tọn, (ISAAC,) an eminent minister of the Society of Friends, was born about 1618. His father was lord mayor of London and a member of the Long Parliament. He married Mary, the widow of Sir William Springett, (whose daughter became the wife of William Penn,) and resided at Chalfont, Bucks. During the reign of Charles II. he was imprisoned six times for his religious principles. "He grew rich and fruitful in all heavenly treasure," says William Penn,—"full of love, faith, mercy, patience, and long-suffering. Insomuch that I may say he was one of a thousand; zealous, yet tender, wise, yet humble. . . . One that ever loved power and life more than words." Died in 1679. He left "Letters" and other writings, which are highly prized.

Penn, (GRANVILLE,) an English author, born in Philadelphia in 1761, was a son of Thomas Penn, and a grandson of William Penn. He was a clerk in the British war office. Among his works are "Remarks on the Eastern Origin of Mankind and of the Arts of Cultivated Life," and a "Life of Admiral Penn," (1833.) Died in 1844.

Penn, (JOHN,) an American patriot, and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Caroline county, Virginia, in 1741. Having removed in 1774 to North Carolina, he was elected in 1775 to the Continental Congress. Died in 1788.

Penn, (JOHN,) F.R.S., an English mechanical engineer, born at Greenwich in 1805, was the inventor and constructor of well-approved steam-engines for ships. Died at Lee, September 23, 1878.

Penn, (Sir WILLIAM,) an able English admiral, father of William Penn, was born at Bristol in 1621. He became a rear-admiral about 1644, obtained the rank of admiral in 1653, and commanded the fleet which co-operated with Venables in the capture of Jamaica from the Spaniards in 1655. He promoted the restoration of Charles II. In 1660 he was appointed governor of Kinsale. He was commander-in-chief, under the Duke of York, of the fleet which gained a victory over the Dutch in 1665. He retired from the service in 1669, and died at Wanstead, Essex, in 1670.

See GRANVILLE PENN, "Memorials of the Life of Admiral Sir William Penn," 1833.

Penn, (WILLIAM,) the founder of Pennsylvania, and one of the most illustrious of Christian philanthropists, was born in London on the 14th of October, 1644. He was the eldest son of Captain (afterwards Admiral) Penn and Margaret, the daughter of John Jasper, a merchant of Rotterdam. At an early age he was sent to the Chigwell School, in Essex. While here, before he was eleven years old, his mind was deeply impressed with the importance of religion, and he believed that he was even then divinely called to consecrate his life to the service of God. When about fifteen, he was sent to Christ Church, Oxford, where he became acquainted with John Locke, afterwards so distinguished as the author of the "Essay on the Human Understanding." While at the university, Penn appears to have applied himself diligently to his studies, and to have made rapid progress not only in the classics but likewise in several of the modern languages. He is said also to have devoted much of his attention to theology and history. Nor did he neglect the cultivation of his physical powers. With a handsome person, in which were united strength and grace, he appears to have been well fitted to excel in those out-door exercises which were then and are still in vogue among the students of Oxford. He was, we are told, a skilful boatman as well as an adventurous sportsman. But, while he was thus applying himself with youthful zeal to the pursuits deemed appropriate to young gentlemen of his condition, a new influence arose, which was destined to change entirely the current of his future life. Thomas Loe, who had formerly belonged to the university, but now one of the new sect of Friends or Quakers, preached at Oxford. The views which he promulgated made a powerful impression on the mind of Penn. He, with several other students who had beheld with displeasure the recent attempt to introduce into the university certain forms and observances which they considered to be little better than papistical mummeries, absented themselves from the established worship, and began to hold meetings among themselves, conducting their devotional exercises in their own way. Thereupon they were fined by the heads of the college for nonconformity; but this, instead of deterring them from the course they had taken, only added fuel to their zeal. It happened soon after that an order came down from the king that the surplice should be worn by the students, according to the custom of former times. This so exasperated some of them, among whom Penn appears to have taken a leading part, that they not only refused to wear the surplice themselves, but, falling upon those who appeared in surplices, they forcibly tore off from them the offensive badge. For this flagrant and open violation of the laws of the university, Penn and several of his associates were expelled.

This disgrace was a bitter mortification to the admiral, a worldly and ambitious man, who had built the greatest hopes on his eldest and favourite son. When William returned home, his father received him with cold and stern disapprobation. His son, although for the time carried away with a fanatical zeal, was perfectly sincere, and, finding his conduct not disapproved by some men of note who were jealous of what they considered the encroachments of popery, would not admit that he had done wrong in resisting the authority of the king with respect to the surplice. His father, having tried in vain to reclaim him by argument, proceeded next, like one accustomed to arbitrary power, to blows, and at last, it is said, turned him out-of-doors. It was not long, however, before the admiral, who really loved his son and was proud of his abilities, began to relent; and at the intercession of his mother, an amiable and excellent woman, William was forgiven and recalled.

With a view to dissipate his son's religious impressions, the admiral at length resolved to send him to France, in company with some other young gentlemen of rank who were about to set out on a tour across the continent. At Paris he was introduced to a brilliant circle, including some of the most distinguished young noblemen of England, and was presented to the king, Louis XIV., at whose court he is said to have been a frequent and welcome guest. During his stay in the French capital, as he was returning one night from a party, a man, who seems to have been a total stranger, under some imaginary affront, drew his rapier upon him, and, in an angry tone, bade him defend himself. Penn expostulated with him, but in vain; so that at last, to protect himself, he was fain to use his sword. His hot-headed antagonist was quickly disarmed; but, instead of taking any advantage of his vanquished foeman, he courteously returned him his rapier, much to the surprise, it appears, of the bystanders, who naturally enough supposed that he would have used the opportunity thus afforded to take ample revenge upon one who had so causelessly attacked him.

After leaving Paris he spent several months at Saumur, reading the works of the Fathers and studying theology under the instruction of Moses Amyrault, one of the ablest and most learned of the French Protestant divines. He afterwards commenced a tour through Italy, but on reaching Turin he received a letter from his father, recalling him to England, that he might take charge of the affairs of the family while the admiral was engaged abroad in the war against Holland. The appearance of young Penn on his return from his continental tour was well calculated to fill a father's heart with joy and pride. He had grown into a tall, graceful, and handsome man, with a countenance of singular gentleness and sweetness, yet expressing both intelligence and resolution. His sojourn in the gayest and most brilliant capital of Europe appears to have completely effaced those serious impressions which, in his father's judgment, were so unsuited to a youth of his rank and accomplishments. All the hopes which the admiral had formerly cherished of the future distinction of his son were now revived. That his son might not relapse into his former seriousness, he resolved to keep him constantly employed. With this view, he had him entered at Lincoln's Inn as a student of law.

In the early part of 1665, Admiral Penn, accompanied by the Duke of York, then lord high admiral of England, gained a decisive victory over the Dutch, commanded by Admiral Opdam. The duke had the good sense to intrust all the important movements of the fleet to the direction of Admiral Penn, who had the title of Great Captain Commander. The plague having broken out in London, it appears to have affected William Penn, as it did thousands of others, and to have awakened in his mind the most serious thoughts. His father, fearing lest he should lose the fruit of all his former care, resolved to send his son with letters to the gay and brilliant court of the Duke of Ormond, Viceroy of Ireland, with whom Admiral Penn was on terms of intimate friendship. Soon after his son's arrival, a mutiny occurred among the troops at Carrickfergus. Penn volunteered his services in reducing them to obedience, and, in the siege that followed, won by his courage and coolness general applause; and the viceroy himself wrote to the admiral, expressing his great satisfaction with young Penn's conduct, at the same time proposing that he should join the army. He himself was at first so much elated by the distinction he had acquired, that he resolved to become a soldier, and, under the influence of this new ambition, caused himself to be painted in military costume. "It is," says Dixon, "a curious fact that the only genuine portrait of the great apostle of peace existing represents him armed and accoutred as a soldier." The admiral, however, disapproving his son's project, sent him to take charge of the large estates which he possessed in the south of Ireland. While on business at Cork, William Penn had an opportunity of again hearing Thomas

Loe, by whose preaching he had been so strongly impressed some years before. His early convictions were revived; and from that time he felt it to be his imperative duty, in defiance of ridicule and persecution, to join his lot with the despised Quakers. Being at a meeting at Cork in 1667, he was arrested, with several other Quakers, and taken to prison. While here, he wrote to the Earl of Orrery, setting forth the injustice of his imprisonment and advocating universal toleration in faith and worship. On receiving his letter, Lord Orrery gave an order for his immediate release. A rumour that Penn had become a Quaker reached his father. He immediately ordered him home. When the admiral, on seeing his son, observed that he was still dressed like a gentleman, that he wore lace, plume, and rapier, he felt reassured, and began to hope that he had been misinformed. But these hopes were soon dispelled. His son candidly acknowledged to him that his religious convictions had undergone a radical change, and that he was now a Quaker. The disappointment and vexation of the admiral were extreme. Yet, in the hope of winning back his son, he made use of every argument, and even condescended to entreat and implore; but all in vain. The refusal of his son to uncover in the presence of his superiors in rank was especially mortifying to him.* Although his arguments and entreaties had proved alike unavailing, he was unwilling to abandon all hope. As a last resort, he proposed a compromise: he would yield to the scruples and wishes of his son in every other respect, if the latter would only consent to take off his hat in his father's presence and in that of the king and the Duke of York. William asked time to consider this proposition. After some time spent in reflection and earnest prayer, he announced to his father that he was unable to comply with his wishes. Thereupon the indignant admiral again expelled him from the house. For some months he was dependent upon the hospitality of his friends, and upon such pecuniary aid as his mother could from time to time find an opportunity of sending him. At length his father relented so far as to allow him to return home; but he still refused to see or hold any intercourse with him. About this time (1668) William Penn first began to preach and to write in defence of the new doctrines which he had embraced. His first work, entitled "Truth Exalted," was addressed to kings, priests, and people, whom he earnestly exhorted to re-examine the foundation of their faith and worship, and to inquire how far they were built upon the authority of God, or whether they did not rest in a great measure on the mere notions of men. A number of publications, mostly controversial, followed. One of these, entitled "The Sandy Foundation Shaken," attracted much attention. Pepys considered it too good to be the production of so young a man. In this work Penn had attempted, among other things, to refute "the Notion of one God subsisting in three distinct and separate Persons." For this "heresy" he was apprehended and sent to the Tower, where he was kept in solitary confinement for more than eight months. While in the Tower, a report reached him that the Bishop of London had resolved that he should recant, or die in prison. Penn replied, with the spirit of a martyr and a hero, "that his prison should be his grave before he would renounce his just opinions; for that he owed his conscience to no man." During his confinement in the Tower he composed "No Cross, No Crown," perhaps the most popular of all his larger works. He also wrote to Lord Arlington, then principal secretary of state, on the injustice and absurdity of attempting to coerce men's religious opinions. Learning that the views advanced in his "Sandy Foundation Shaken" had been misrepresented, he wrote "Innocency with her Open Face," in which he showed that to deny the existence in the Godhead of "three DISTINCT and SEPARATE persons" did not necessarily involve a denial of Christ's eternal divinity, which he acknowledged to the fullest extent. In this Penn took substantially the same ground as was afterwards taken by Barclay and many other of the leading Quakers. They felt that in speaking of the great and awful mysteries of the Divine nature there was a sort of presumption in going beyond the words of the Holy Scriptures. They accordingly rejected the term "Trinity," as not found in the Scriptures, and, on still stronger grounds, as they conceived, they refused to accept the doctrine of "three distinct and separate persons" in the Godhead, as being neither expressed nor necessarily implied in the language of inspiration. The manly behaviour of his son while in prison appears to have strongly excited the respect and sympathy of the admiral. He used his influence at court, and, after a time, William Penn was set at liberty.

In 1669, at the desire of his father, who intimated his wishes to his son through Lady Penn, William went again to Ireland, to take charge of the estates belonging to the admiral in that island. He remained there about eight months, when he was recalled on account of his father's failing health. His sister Margaret had been married, and his younger brother Richard was then travelling in Italy. Feeling that his days were drawing to a close, the admiral was anxious to be reconciled to his eldest son, who appears, before the recent disagreement, to have always been his favourite. As soon as William returned to England, the reconciliation took place, to the joy of all parties, especially of his mother. In August of the same year, William Penn preached at a meeting in Grace Church Street, where he and William Mead were arrested by warrants from the mayor of London. "The trial which followed was," says Dixon, "perhaps the most important trial that ever took place in England. Penn stood before his judges, in this celebrated scene, not so much as a Quaker pleading for the rights of conscience, as an Englishman contending for the ancient and imprescriptible liberties of his race." The jury having brought in a verdict favourable to the prisoners, the recorder said they should be locked up, without meat, drink, fire, and tobacco, "till we have a verdict the court will accept,—or you shall starve for it." Though repeatedly menaced with starvation and other cruelties, such as slitting their noses, (a barbarous but not uncommon punishment for offenders in those days,) the jury still persisted in their verdict. They were kept for two days and nights without food, drink, or fire; but this, as well as the threats of the court, proving ineffectual, they were at last fined for their obstinacy, and, on refusing to pay their fines, were sent to prison. "For centuries," says Dixon, "it had remained an unsettled question of law, whether the jury had or had not a right so far to exercise its own discretion as to bring in a verdict contrary to the sense of the court." This important question was now to be decided. Bushel and his fellow-jurors, at Penn's suggestion, brought an action against the mayor and recorder for unjust imprisonment. The case was brought before the court of common pleas, consisting of twelve judges, and decided all-but unanimously in favour of the jurymen, who were accordingly set at liberty and left their prison in triumph. Although Penn and Mead had been declared not guilty by the verdict of the jury, yet they were still detained in prison, because they refused to pay the fines which the mayor and recorder had arbitrarily and most unjustly imposed on them for contempt of court. At length, as the admiral, from his increasing illness, became more and more anxious to have his son with him, he sent privately and paid the fines both for him and his friend. He also sent a dying request to the Duke of York that he would be a friend to his son in the trials and sufferings to which, while the persecuting laws of England continued in force, he foresaw he would necessarily be exposed. On his death-bed the admiral expressed entire satisfaction with the course his son had pursued. He said to him, among other things, "Let nothing in this world tempt you to wrong your conscience. Have a care of sin: it is that which is the sting both of life and death." On his father's decease, William Penn came into the possession of an estate yielding an annual income of about fifteen hundred pounds, a sum which was probably equal to twice or three times the same numerical amount at the present day. Rarely, if ever, has wealth fallen into better hands. "There is abundant evidence," says Janney,

* For a brief explanation of the views of the Quakers with respect to taking off the hat, and some other of their prominent peculiarities, see the article on GEORGE FOX.

"that throughout life he made use of his wealth for the benefit of others, rather than to promote his own ease and indulgence."

The persecution against the Quakers continuing, Penn published a number of books and tracts in vindication of the peculiar views of the society, and in defence of the great principle that in matters of faith men are accountable to Heaven only, and, provided their moral conduct is blameless, no human government has a right to inquire into or exercise any control over the religious opinions of its subjects. The following are the titles of some of the most important of these publications: "A Seasonable Caveat against Popery," (1670,) "The Great Case of Liberty of Conscience Debated and Defended," (1671,) "Truth Rescued from Imposture," (1671,) "The Spirit of Truth Vindicated," (1672,) "Quakerism a New Nickname for Old Christianity," etc., "England's Present Interest Considered," (1674,)—a most able work in defence of freedom of conscience and the rights of Englishmen. Several of his smaller works, as well as "The Great Case of Liberty of Conscience," were written while he was imprisoned in Newgate in 1671. In 1672, when Penn was in his twenty-eighth year, he married Gulielma Maria Springett, daughter of Sir William Springett, who as a colonel had greatly distinguished himself in the service of the Parliament, and who died during the civil wars, at the early age of twenty-three. His widow was afterwards married to Isaac Penington, one of the most prominent of the early Quakers. In 1677, William Penn, accompanied by Robert Barclay and others, made a journey into Holland and Germany, and visited the princess Elizabeth of the Rhine, the granddaughter of James I. and sister of the famous Prince Rupert. She received them with great kindness. Having previously met with Penn, she was not unacquainted with the religious views of the Quakers, which she appears to have regarded with much favour.

Penn did not think that it was the duty of a Christian to withdraw himself wholly from public affairs, but rather to strive in every way to promote the freedom, enlightenment, and happiness of mankind. The true friends of liberty everywhere found in him a sympathizer and a friend. A little previous to the election of 1679, when the celebrated Algernon Sidney offered himself as a candidate for Parliament, Penn issued a pamphlet showing the importance of electing to the great legislative body of the kingdom wise men and such as feared God and hated covetousness. He not only felt the deepest interest, but he himself bore a very active part, in the canvass for Sidney, the representative and devoted champion of political freedom. Sidney was triumphantly elected, in spite of much unfair opposition. But soon after the assembling of the new Parliament it was dissolved by the king, and another election became necessary. Sidney was again duly returned, but he was prevented from taking his place in Parliament by the intrigues of the royalist party. It was a bitter disappointment to Penn; but, in proportion as he lost hope of freedom in England, he bent his thoughts more earnestly towards realizing the dream of his youth,—the founding of a new and more perfect commonwealth amid the forests of North America. In 1675 he had been chosen umpire to settle a dispute between Edward Byllinge and John Fenwick (both Quakers) respecting their claims to a tract of land known as West Jersey. He decided in favour of Byllinge; but the latter, having become much embarrassed in his affairs, in order to satisfy his creditors gave up to them his interest in the territory. At the earnest solicitation of Byllinge, Penn was associated with the creditors as a joint trustee. Within the next two or three years several vessels came to West Jersey, with about eight hundred emigrants, of whom the greater number were Quakers. Through the influence of Penn there was adopted a very liberal constitution, among the provisions of which were the right of free worship and the right of the people (with only very slight restrictions) to legislate for themselves. There was to be no imprisonment for debt: the property of the debtor being given up to his creditors, he himself was to go free. Penn had inherited from his father a claim against the government of £16,000. In 1680 he obtained from the king, in payment of that claim, an extensive tract of land immediately west of the river Delaware and north of Maryland. In the patent given by the king the name "Pennsylvania," contrary to Penn's wishes, was applied to the territory. He had previously suggested Sylvania, on account of its being then a land of forests. Penn offered twenty guineas to one of the secretaries to have the name changed, but he was refused. He even applied to the king; "for," says he, "I feared lest it should be looked on as a vanity in me." But the king said it should remain as it was, the Penn having been added in honour of the admiral. The patent conferred upon the people and governor a legislative power, so that no law could be made nor money raised without the people's consent, and they could pass what laws they pleased, provided they did not interfere with the allegiance which all the colonies owed to the crown. Aided by the counsels of Algernon Sidney and others, he drew up a masterly scheme of government, the wisdom of which has been amply vindicated by the experience of two hundred years. The constitution which Penn gave to his colony will compare advantageously not merely with the plan of government formed by Locke for Carolina, but with any of the systems of the wisest lawgivers that have ever lived. "To understand," says Dixon, "how much Penn was wiser than his age, . . . he must be measured not only against unlettered men like Fox, but against the highest types of learning and liberality which it afforded. Between John Locke and William Penn there is a gulf like that which separates the seventeenth and the nineteenth century. Locke never escaped from the thraldom of local ideas."

About the beginning of September, 1682, Penn set sail in the ship Welcome, and on the 27th of October cast anchor in Delaware Bay, off New Castle. He was received by the inhabitants of that town with the greatest enthusiasm. Soon after he proceeded to the site of Philadelphia, then covered for the most part with lofty trees. About the end of November, 1682, was held the famous treaty with the Indians, under a magnificent elm-tree, in what is now Kensington. Of this treaty, Voltaire says it was "the only league between the aborigines and the Christians which was never sworn to and never broken."

Referring the reader to other works for a more particular account of the early colony, we shall for the future confine ourselves chiefly to the personal history of Penn. In 1684, having committed the government to the provincial council, he embarked for England, leaving behind him in the colony a white population of about 7000 persons. He set sail on the 12th of August, and on the 6th of October landed in Sussex, within seven miles of his own house, after an absence from his family of rather more than two years. He soon after visited the king and the Duke of York, by both of whom, he says, he was received very graciously. The first use he made of his influence at court was to intercede for the persecuted Quakers, against whom the recent oppressive enactments were at that time enforced with a merciless rigour. Their conscientious scruples against swearing exposed them to peculiar hardships. When evil-disposed persons charged them with being disaffected to the government, they might in many instances have delivered themselves from the hands of their persecutors by simply taking the oath of allegiance and supremacy; but this their religious convictions would not permit them to do.

It is scarcely necessary here to do more than allude to the charges made by Macaulay against the character of Penn, as those charges have already been completely and unanswerably refuted,* and are now rejected by all candid and intelligent persons who have taken the trouble to give them a careful examination. But another accusation, scarcely less formidable, though somewhat vague, has found supporters among men of great intelligence and respectability,—namely, that the fact that

* For the correctness of this statement, we confidently appeal to all who have dispassionately and attentively read the evidence in the case. See, on this subject, DIXON'S "Life of Penn;" W. E. FORSTER'S "William Penn and Thomas Babington Macaulay," 1850; J. PAGET'S "New Examen," London, 1861; and the "Quarterly Review" for April, 1868.

Penn enjoyed such favour with James II., and that he continued at court after he had every opportunity of knowing the character of that monarch, proves him to have been either lax in principle or deficient in the firmness of true virtue. If this reasoning be correct, then we ought to applaud the conduct of the early Christian ascetics, who held that the best mode of preserving one's soul unspotted and preparing it for heaven, was to abandon all intercourse with a corrupt world. But the most virtuous and enlightened men of modern times have usually taught a very different doctrine,—that they who, without partaking of its sins, mingle with the world for the purpose of reforming it, are far more praiseworthy than those who, leaving it to its fate, seek shelter for their feeble virtue in inactivity and selfish seclusion. If it shall be clearly shown that while at court Penn was guilty of a single act inconsistent with the character of an honest man and a true lover of his country, we shall then be prepared to abandon his defence; but if the whole charge against him limits itself simply to this, that he had favour and influence with a corrupt and tyrannical monarch, when it is well known that he often exerted that influence successfully to restrain the injustice, or to soften the severity, of James, and when there is not a shadow of evidence that he ever, even in a solitary instance, exerted it for any unworthy purpose,—if this, we repeat, be the whole extent of the charge against him, we cannot but regard such an accusation as conferring on the accused the highest honour.

It should be remembered that Admiral Penn had made a dying request to the Duke of York (afterwards James II.) that he would be a friend and protector to his son. It is but just to say that James, who seems to have cherished the warmest regard for the admiral, not only never forgot his friend's request, but appears to have observed it with the most scrupulous fidelity. It was but natural that William Penn should be sincerely attached to a prince who had been his father's friend and was to him a generous and faithful guardian. He doubtless gave James far more credit for liberality and sincerity than he deserved. But his gratitude and affection towards a bigoted and, in some respects, an unscrupulous prince, appears never for a single moment to have warped him from the path of rectitude.

It would have been indeed wonderful if, in the violent party excitements of those times, his character had wholly escaped suspicion and calumny. But the various charges made against him are found, on examination, to be unsupported by a particle of real evidence. To have absented himself from court at that time, when it was in his power to do so much, not only for his persecuted brethren, but for all, of whatever name, who suffered from unjust laws or from the unjust suspicions of the government, would have been a most culpable abandonment of duty. Yet the fact that he did not thus absent himself has been the principal, if not the only, ground of all the charges which the envious or the misinformed have circulated against him. During the reign of Charles II., Penn obtained for himself and his friends many favours from his sovereign through the mediation of the Duke of York; but after the accession of James II. his influence at court became very great. He removed his residence to Holland House, at Kensington. "His influence with the king," says Dixon, "was well known, and every man with a real grievance found in him a counsellor and a friend." "If any fault," says the same writer, in another place, "can be found with his conduct, it is that his charity was a little too universal, a little too indiscriminate." As his sympathies were chiefly with the liberal party, he had often occasion to intercede for mercy or indulgence to those who were regarded by the king as his most determined enemies. And, though he often failed in obtaining his request, he appears never to have omitted an opportunity of interceding when there was the slightest chance of success. He sometimes excited the violent anger of James by his zeal in behalf of the friends of liberty.* But nothing could deter him from exercising that influence with his sovereign which he believed Providence had given him for the most important ends,—the promotion of justice and mercy.

In 1686, chiefly through Penn's influence, a proclamation was issued by which more than twelve hundred imprisoned Quakers were set at liberty. Another proclamation in 1687 gave liberty of conscience to all, unrestricted by any tests or penalties. After the accession of William III., in 1688, Penn, having incurred suspicion on account of his intimacy with James, was tried before the royal council for treason; but, no evidence being found against him, he was discharged. He was subsequently tried for conspiracy, and was again honourably acquitted. In the early part of 1694 he lost his wife Gulielma; about two years after he married, as his second wife, Hannah Callowhill. In 1696 his eldest son, Springett Penn, died of consumption. He made in 1699 a second visit to America. But, learning not long after his arrival in the colony that there was a measure before the House of Lords for bringing all the proprietary governments under the crown, he returned to England in 1701. Happily, the obnoxious measure was soon after abandoned.

In consequence of the bad management and dishonesty of some of the agents to whom he had intrusted the care of his property, he sustained great losses, and became so involved as to be unable to pay the claims of his creditors. He preferred to go to prison rather than attempt to satisfy certain unjust and extortionate claims which the very agent who had mismanaged his affairs brought against him. By the intervention of some of his friends, a compromise was effected, and he was at length released. It was a great sorrow to him in his latter years that, although he had never spared himself or his means to promote the interests of his colony, when he desired of the colonial legislature a moderate loan to relieve him from his difficulties it was refused. Worn out at length with the incessant labours and cares of a life spent almost wholly in the service of others, he died, from the effects of paralysis, in 1718.

Pennafort. See Raymond de Peñafort.

Pen'nant, (Thomas,) an English naturalist and antiquary, born at Downing, in Flintshire, in 1726. He published in 1761 the first volume of a large work on British Zoology, which was translated into Latin and German and often reprinted. A tour on the continent in 1765 procured for him the acquaintance of Buffon, Haller, and Pallas. In 1771 he published a "Synopsis of Quadrupeds," an enlarged edition of which appeared in 1781 as a "History of Quadrupeds." This work was described by Cuvier, about 1823, as "still indispensable." Among his other works are the "Genera of Birds," (1773, unfinished,) a "Second Tour in Scotland and a Voyage to the Hebrides," (2 vols., 1774–76,) and "Arctic Zoology," (3 vols., 1784–87,) which Cuvier commends as précieux to naturalists. Died in 1798.

include "Puck on Pegasus," (1861,) "Crescent," (1866,) "Modern Babylon," (1873,) "The Muses of Mayfair," (1874,) "Pegasus Resaddled," (1877,) etc. He also wrote "The Angler-Naturalist," (1864.) "Book of the Pike," (1866,) "Fishing Gossip, (1867,) "Modern Practical Angler," (1873,) and other works.

Pen'nell, (JOSEPH,) an artist-illustrator, born in the United States, resident in England. The works published and illustrated by him are numerous, from "A Canterbury Pilgrimage," (1885,) to "The Alhambra," (1896,) "The Works of Charles Keene," (1897,) etc. His wife, ELIZABETH ROBINS, joined him in authorship.

Pennethorne, pĕn'thorn, ? (JAMES,) an English architect, born at Worcester in 1801, was a pupil of Nash and Pugin. He designed many public buildings of London, among which are the Museum of Practical Geology, the General Record Repository, and an addition to Somerset House. He was appointed, several years since, architect and surveyor of her Majesty's parks, palaces, etc. Died in 1871.

Penney, (WILLIAM.) See KINLOCH.

Penni, pen'nee, (GIOVANNI FRANCESCO,) a celebrated Italian painter, surnamed IL FATTORE, ("the Steward,") was born at Florence in 1488. He was in his youth the steward of Raphael, who was his friend. He aided Raphael in painting the cartoons of the Vatican, and, after the death of his master, he and Giulio Romano finished a "Coronation of the Virgin," designed by Raphael. He excelled in landscapes. Died at Naples in 1528.

Pen-thę-sĭ-lē'ĭa or Pen-thę-sī-le'ą, [Gr. Πενθεσίλεια; Fr. PENTHÉSILÉE, pôN'tā'ze'lā',] the queen of the Amazons. According to some traditions, she fought against the Greeks at the siege of Troy, and was killed by Achilles, who admired too late her beauty and valour and lamented her fate.

Pen'theŭs, [Gr. Πενθεύς; Fr. PENTHÉE, pôN'tā',] a mythical person, said to be a son of Echion, and King of Thebes. He was killed by his mother and other women because he opposed the worship of Bacchus and ascended a tree to witness furtively their revels and orgies.

Penthièvre, de, dęh pôN'te'ĕvr', (LOUIS JEAN MARIE DE BOURBON,) DUC, a French nobleman, born in 1725, was a son of the Count of Toulouse. He served as general at Fontenoy, (1745.) He was noted for his liberality or benevolence. His daughter was the mother of King Louis Philippe. Died in 1793.

Penzance, pen-zănss', (JAMES PLAISTED Wilde,) LORD, an English judge, a brother of Lord Truro, was born in London, July 12, 1816. He was educated at Winchester, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, graduating as A.B. in 1838. In 1839 he was called to the bar in the Inner Temple, was made a Queen's counsel in 1855, and was knighted in 1880. He was judge of the court of probate and divorce, 1863–72, was ennobled and made Baron Penzance in 1869, and in 1875 was appointed judge of the public worship regulation court and of the provincial (ecclesiastical) courts. He gained several victories over the Austrians in 1848, but after the defeat of Temesvár he took refuge in Turkey, and afterwards settled in the island of Jersey. In 1867 he returned to Hungary and became a member of Parliament at Vienna.

Pẹr-dic'cas [Gr. Περδίκκας] I., King of Macedon, was, according to Herodotus, the founder of the Macedonian monarchy. He is supposed to have lived about 750 B.C.

Perdiccas II., King of Macedon, was the son and successor of Alexander I. He waged war against the Athenians. Died about 413 B.C.

Perdiccas III., a son of Amyntas II. of Macedon, began to reign about 364 B.C. He was killed in battle against the Illyrians in 359, and was succeeded by his brother, Philip II.

Perdiccas, [Gr. Περδίκκας,] a prominent Macedonian general, who commanded a division of the army of Alexander the Great in his invasion of Asia, was a son of Orontes. It is reported that Alexander, on his deathbed, gave his royal signet to Perdiccas, as if to designate him for the office of regent. Having obtained command of the household troops who guarded the young king, he exercised the power of regent, or chief minister, and, to secure the succession of Roxana's son, put her rival Statira to death. He also put to death his rival Meleager. He failed in a matrimonial intrigue in relation to Cleopatra, a sister of Alexander, and became the enemy of Antigonus and Antipater, who formed with Ptolemy a coalition against him. Perdiccas found an able adherent or ally in Eumenes, (who opposed Antipater and Antigonus in Asia Minor,) and marched against Ptolemy in Egypt. He met with a reverse near the Nile, and was killed by his own soldiers in 321 B.C.

Pẹr'dix, [Gr. Πέρδιξ,] a nephew, or, as some say, a sister, of Dædalus, was regarded as the inventor of the saw, the compasses, and other implements. According to the fable, Perdix was changed into a partridge.

Perez, pā'rĕth or pee'rez, (ANTONIO,) a Spanish courtier, born about 1540, was a son of Gonzalo Perez, who was secretary of state under Charles V. and Philip II. He succeeded his father in 1567, and obtained the confidence and favour of the king, who used him as his instrument in the assassination of Escovedo, the intriguing secretary of Don John of Austria, (1578.) Soon after this event, Perez and the princess Eboli were arrested by order of Philip, who, it appears, induced Perez to give up all the papers which would implicate him in the death of Escovedo. Subjected to the rack, Perez confessed his own share in that crime, and accused the king of complicity in it. About 1590 he escaped from prison, and sought refuge at Saragossa, the citizens of which rose in arms to protect him and assert their own civil rights. He escaped to France, published an account of his sufferings, (1594,) and received a pension from Henry IV. Died at Paris in 1611, or, as others say, 1616.

Pĕr'I-clēs, [Gr. Περικλῆς; Ger. PERIKLES, pā're-klĕs,] an illustrious Athenian statesman, and one of the greatest orators that ever lived, was a son of Xanthippus, who defeated the Persians at Mycale. His mother, Agariste, was a niece of Clisthenes. He studied various arts and sciences under Damon the musician, Zeno of Elea, and Anaxagoras. "The philosopher," says Plutarch, "who gave him that force and sublimity of sentiment superior to all the demagogues, who formed him to that admirable dignity of manners, was Anaxagoras." He kept himself aloof from public affairs for some years after he had arrived at manhood. About 470 B.C. he began his public career as the leader of the democratic party, and, lest he should make himself too cheap among the people, reserved himself for great occasions. He had a graceful figure, a sweet voice, and complete self-command. "Adorning his orations with the rich colours of philosophy," says Plutarch, "adding the loftiness of imagination and all-commanding energy with which philosophy supplied him, to his native powers of genius, and using whatever he found to his purpose in the study of nature, he far excelled all other orators."

He gained popularity by a law that the people should enjoy theatrical amusements at the public expense, and deprived the Areopagus of the judicial power which rendered it a dangerous engine of the aristocracy, (461 B.C.) About this date he used his influence to procure the ostracism of Cimon, the leader of the conservative or aristocratic party. Pericles displayed courage at the battle of Tanagra, in 457, and proposed the decree that Cimon should be recalled from exile. After the death of Cimon and the ostracism of Thucydides, (444 B.C.,) Pericles directed the government with undisputed supremacy. "He became sole master of Athens," says Plutarch; "he kept the public good in his eye, and pursued the strait path of honour." He commanded in the Samian war, which ended in the conquest of Samos in 440 B.C., and extended the influence of Athens by planting colonies at Chalcis, Sinope, Thurii, and other places. He expended the public money profusely in the erection of magnificent temples and monuments, which have never been equalled as models of art and taste. Under his auspices the Parthenon was built and was adorned with the sculptures of Phidias. The age of Pericles was the most brilliant period of Grecian art and dramatic literature. He silenced those who murmured at his extravagance in building, by an offer to pay the expense out of his own purse on condition that his name alone should be inscribed on the new edifices.

The foreign policy of Pericles was not less far-sighted than his internal policy. He constantly opposed the ambitious schemes of foreign conquest which the Athenians were prone to entertain, and took effectual measures to render the maritime power of Athens superior to that of any other state. The long walls which connected Athens with the sea, and protected it from the attack of an army by land, formed an important part of his foreign policy, continuing on a gigantic scale the plans of Themistocles. This measure excited great alarm among the Spartans and their allies. Under his administration Athens became an imperial state, with an extensive list of allies, partly free and partly tributary, and attained the maximum of her power. To subvert this power, the Spartans organized a league and involved all Greece in the great Peloponnesian war, which began in 431 B.C. The movable property of the Athenians was conveyed within the walls of the capital, and, while the enemy ravaged Attica, the fleet of Pericles made reprisals on the coast of the Peloponnesus.

At the end of the first campaign, Pericles pronounced a long and inimitable funeral oration on those who had fallen in battle. "The eleven chapters of Thucydides which comprise this funeral speech," says Grote, "are among the most memorable relics of antiquity, considering that under the language and arrangement of the historian . . . we possess the substance and thoughts of the illustrious statesman. . . . After a few words on the magnitude of the empire, and on the glorious efforts as well as endurance whereby their forefathers and they had acquired it, Pericles proceeds to sketch the plan of life, the constitution, and the manners under which such achievements were brought about." (Chap. xlviii.)

In the second year of the war a great plague raged at Athens. The people became so demoralized that they deprived Pericles of command and punished him with a fine. He had recovered his influence a short time when he died, in the autumn of 429 B.C. "As a military commander," says Grote, "though nowise deficient in personal courage, he rarely courted distinction, and was principally famous for his care of the lives of the citizens. His private habits were sober and recluse, . . . while the tenderest domestic attachment bound him to the engaging and cultivated Aspasia." (See ASPASIA.) To use the language of a writer in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," "he wielded the powers of his majestic intelligence and the stores of his spacious imagination with consummate ease and mastery."

Perry, (JOHN,) an English engineer, born about 1670. He entered the service of Peter the Great, as engineer, in 1698, and published a work called "The State of Russia under the Present Czar," (1716.) Died in England in 1733.

Perry, (JOHN,) a British engineer, born in Ulster, Ireland, in 1850. He was professor of engineering in Japan 1875-79, and at Finsbury 1881-96, and of mathematics and mechanics at South Kensington after 1896. He wrote "The Steam Engine," (1874,) "Practical Mechanics," (1883,) "Spinning-Tops," (1890,) "Applied Mechanics," (1897,) etc.

Pĕr'rў, (MATTHEW CALBRAITH,) an American naval officer, born at South Kingston, Rhode Island, in 1795, was a brother of Commodore Perry. He served in the Mexican war of 1847, and in 1852 commanded the expedition to Japan, which opened the way to intercourse between that country and the United States. An account of this voyage was published, in 3 vols., in 1856. Died in 1858.

Perry, (NORA,) an American author, born at Dudley, Massachusetts, in 1841. Her writings consisted of poems and stories for girls, including "New Songs and Ballads," (1886,) "Lyrics and Legends," (1890,) "Three Little Daughters of the Revolution," (1896,) etc. Died in 1896.

Perry, (OLIVER HAZARD,) a distinguished American commodore, born at Newport, Rhode Island, in 1785. On the 13th of September, 1813, as commander of a squadron on Lake Erie, he defeated the British under Commodore Barclay, after an engagement of three hours. For this brilliant victory he was made a captain and received from Congress a gold medal. Having been appointed commander of a squadron bound for the coast of Columbia, he died of yellow fever, in the island of Trinidad, in August, 1819.

Pẹr'seūs, [Gr. Περσεύς; Fr. PERSÉE, pĕR'sā',] a famous hero and demi-god of classic mythology, was called a son of Jupiter and Danaë. (See DANAË.) According to the fable, King Polydectes extorted from him a rash promise to bring to him the head of Medusa. To equip him for this enterprise, Minerva, Mercury, and the Nymphs gave him winged sandals, a helmet which rendered him invisible, and a mirror by means of which he could see the image of the Gorgon and avoid the petrifying effect of looking at the reality. After he had cut off her head, he flew through the air to Ethiopia, where he rescued Andromeda from a sea-monster and married her.

Pẹr'seūs or Pẹr'sēs, [Gr. Περσεύς; Fr. PERSÉE, pĕR'sā',] the last king of Macedonia, was the eldest son of Philip V., whom he succeeded in 179 B.C. Before this date, by perfidy and intrigues, he had procured the death of his brother Demetrius. He began early to prepare for a renewal of hostilities against the Romans, who declared war against him in 171 B.C. Several campaigns were fought, without decisive results, until L. Æmilius Paulus took command, in 168 B.C. He defeated Perseus with great loss at Pydna, in June, 168, after which the whole kingdom submitted to the victors. Perseus escaped from this battle, but was soon taken prisoner, and was kept in captivity at Alba until his death, about 164 B.C.

See Livy, "History of Rome," books xxxviii.-xlv.

Perseus, a Greek painter and disciple of Apelles, flourished about 300 B.C. He is mentioned by Pliny.

Persiani, pĕr-se-ä'nee, (Fanny Tacchinardi—täk-ke-naR'dee,) an Italian operatic singer, born in Rome in 1818. She married a composer named Persiani about 1835. Died in 1867.

Persigny, (pęr-seen'ye,) de, [Fr. pron. dęh pĕR'sĕn'-ye',] (Jean Gilbert Victor de Fialin—dęh fe'ä'lăN',) Comte, a French minister of state, born in the department of Loire in 1808. He became about 1833 a zealous partisan of Louis Napoleon, and is said to have been the instigator of the attempt made by him at Strasbourg in 1836. In 1840 he was arrested with Louis Napoleon at Boulogne, and condemned to imprisonment for twenty years. He was, however, released before the revolution of 1848, and renewed his intrigues. In January, 1852, he obtained the office of minister of the interior, which he resigned in June, 1854. He was sent as ambassador to London in 1855, was reappointed minister of the interior in November, 1860, and removed in June, 1863. Died in 1872. M. Delaroa published in 1866 a work entitled "Le Duc de Persigny et l'Empire."

Persil, pĕR'sĕl', (Jean Charles,) a French politician and advocate, born at Condom in 1785. He was minister of justice in 1834 and 1835. He published a good work, entitled "Régime hypothécaire," (1809.) Died in 1870.

Persio, pĕR'se-o, (Ascanio,) an Italian philologist, born at Matera about 1550. He wrote a "Treatise on the Conformity of the Italian Language with the Greek," etc., (1592.) His brother Antonio wrote several works on philosophy. Died after 1608.

Persius, pęr'she-us, [Fr. Perse, pĂRss,] or, more fully, Au'lus Per'sius Flac'cus, [It. Aulo Persio Flacco, ŏw'lo pĕR'se-o flăk'ko,] a celebrated Roman satirical poet, was born of an equestrian family at Volaterræ, in Etruria, in 34 A.D. He was a pupil of Cornutus the Stoic, to whom he became attached by an intimate friendship, which lasted until the death of Persius. He associated with Lucan and Seneca. His moral character appears to have been excellent. He died prematurely in November, 62 A.D., leaving six satires, extending altogether to only six hundred and fifty hexameter lines. Though his language is obscure, his style unpolished, and his delineations of men and manners greatly inferior to those of Horace and Juvenal, his sententious satires have been very popular in ancient, mediæval, and modern times. His object is to inculcate the morality of the Stoics. Among the chief merits of his satires is the moral beauty of his doctrines. His dialogues are remarkably spirited, and display much dramatic power. The best English versions of Persius are those by Dryden, Gifford, Brewster, and Howes. Among the best editions of the text are those of Isaac Casaubon, (Paris, 1605,) König, (Göttingen, 1803,) O. Jahn, (Leipsic, 1843,) and Gildersleeve.

He became royal librarian and councillor of the archives in his native city, and was a member of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin. His most important work is entitled "Historical Monuments of Germany," ("Monumenta Germaniæ historica," 13 vols., 1854.) Died October 7, 1876.

Pérugin, Le. See Perugino.

Perugino, pä-roo-jee'no, [called in French Le Pérugin, lęh pä'rü'zhăN',] originally Pietro Vannucci, (vä-noot'chee,) written, also, Vannucci and Vanuzzi, an eminent Italian painter, born at Castello della Pieve in 1446. He painted some frescos for Sixtus V. in the Sistine Chapel, Rome, about 1480, after which he worked at Florence and Perugia, from which circumstance he received his surname Il Perugino, or "the Perugian." He was a good colorist, and surpassed most of his contemporaries in the gracefulness of his heads and figures. His style, however, is considered rather dry. Among his best works are an "Infant Christ with the Virgin," in the Albani palace, Rome, the frescos of Scriptural subjects in the Sala del Cambio at Perugia, and an oil-picture of "The Holy Family," and a "Dead Christ," in the Pitti palace, Florence. He was the master of Raphael. Died in 1524.

Pe'ţer, [Gr. Πέτρος; Lat. PE'TRUS; Fr. PIERRE, pe-aiR'; Ger. PETER, pā'ţer; Ital. PIETRO, pe-ā'tro; Span. PEDRO, pā'dro,] SAINT, one of the twelve apostles, was born at Bethsaida, on the Sea of Galilee, and was a brother of Andrew. His original name was SIMON; but when he became a disciple of Christ he received the name of PETER, which in Greek signifies a "rock." He was sometimes called CEPHAS. His occupation was that of a fisherman. He was a man of ardent temperament, affectionate and generous. He was favoured with special manifestations of his Master's confidence, and performed a more prominent part in the sacred history than any other of the twelve disciples. Peter and Andrew were the first of the apostles in the order of time. On several occasions Peter acted as spokesman for his fellow-apostles; and it is supposed by many that he possessed some pre-eminent authority. When the Lord Jesus was arrested, Peter drew a sword and cut off the ear of the high-priest's servant; but, in the severe crisis that followed, his faith and courage failed, so that he denied his Master. Having recovered from this lapse by hearty repentance, he became a zealous and powerful minister, and spoke with great effect at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. He raised Tabitha, or Dorcas, from the dead, and performed other miracles. He received a divine mission to preach the gospel to Cornelius, a gentile. About 44 A.D. he was cast into prison by Herod the king, but he was delivered by an angel. The last passage of sacred history which mentions Saint Peter is the account of a council held at Jerusalem about 50 A.D. (Acts xv.) Tradition adds that he preached in Galatia, Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Pontus, and that he suffered martyrdom in Rome about 65 A.D. He wrote two epistles, which are included in the canon of Scripture, and are highly prized.

Pe'ţer, (or Pedro, pā'dro,) often called Dom Pedro, (ANTONIO JOZÉ de Alcantara—dà âl-kân'tâ-râ,) Emperor of Brazil and King of Portugal, a son of John VI. of Portugal, was born at Queluz in 1798. On the conquest of Portugal by the French, in 1807, he was taken by his father to Brazil. He married Maria Leopoldina of Austria about 1816, and became Regent of Brazil in 1821. A revolution having rendered Brazil independent of Portugal, Dom Pedro was proclaimed emperor on the 12th of October, 1822. He was recognized as such by the Portuguese government in 1825. At the death of his father (1826) he inherited the throne of Portugal, which he soon abdicated in favour of his daughter, Donna Maria da Gloria. The disaffection of his subjects became so violent that he abdicated the crown of Brazil in favour of his son in 1831, and returned to Portugal, from which he expelled his brother, Dom Miguel, who had usurped the royal power. Died in 1834.

Peter (or Pedro) II. de Alcantara, Emperor of Brazil, born at Rio Janeiro in December, 1825, was a son of the preceding, who abdicated in his favour in 1831. He began to act as emperor on the 23d of July, 1840, when he was declared of age. In 1843 he married Theresa Christina Maria, a daughter of the King of the Two Sicilies. A lover of literature, he was noted for his quiet scholarly tastes rather than for any manifestations of aggressive statesmanship, and was remarkably popular both at home and abroad. His reign was terminated by a bloodless revolution, November 15, 1889, when he was exiled to Europe. Died December 4, 1891.

Peter, of Constantinople. See COURTENAY (PIERRE.)

Peter [Russ. PËTR, pe-ôtr'] I., or Peter the Great, [Fr. PIERRE LE GRAND, pe-aiR' leh grôN; Ger. PETER DER GROSSE, pā'ţer dêr grôs'seh; It. PIETRO IL GRANDE, pe-ā'tro êl grân'dà; Lat. PE'TRUS MAG'NUS,] Czar of Russia, born at Moscow, June 10, 1672, was the third son of Alexis Mikhailovitch. His mother was Natalia, the second wife of Alexis. Feodor, the eldest son of Alexis, having died without issue, in 1682, Peter was recognized as his successor, in preference to Ivan, who was a feeble-minded youth. Their ambitious sister Sophia, however, fomented a bloody mutiny among the strelitzes, and procured the proclamation of Ivan and Peter as joint sovereigns. Sophia acted as regent until 1689, when she was confined in a convent and Peter began to reign as sole autocrat. He married Eudoxia Feodorovna in 1689. Some years before this date he had received scientific instruction from Le Fort, a native of Geneva, who became one of his advisers or ministers after his accession.

Peter had received from nature violent passions and an indomitable energy. In the early part of his reign he determined to reform the institutions, governmental system, and customs of Russia, which was far behind other countries of Europe in civilization. His first care was to organize an army with the European discipline; and he set the example by entering the army himself as a private soldier. He also gave much attention to the construction of a navy, and learned practical seamanship by cruising on the White Sea. He procured the services of many foreign engineers, shipwrights, artisans, etc. In 1696 he captured Azof from the Turks by the aid of his new navy.

Prompted by an irrepressible activity and desire of knowledge, in 1697 he visited Western Europe incognito, accompanied by several of his favourite officers or ministers, who were accredited as ambassadors to Holland. He took a lodging in a small house at Saardam, where he worked for wages as a ship-carpenter, under the name of Pieter Timmerman.

In January, 1698, he went to England, where he passed about three months. Here, says Macaulay, "his stately form, his intellectual forehead, his piercing black eyes, his Tartar nose and mouth, his gracious smile, his frown, black with all the stormy rage and hate of a barbarian tyrant, . . . were during some weeks popular topics of conversation." He returned to his capital, Moscow, after an absence of seventeen months, and punished with great severity the strelitzes, who had rebelled while he was absent. He established naval and other schools, caused useful works to be translated into Russian, required his subjects to trade with foreigners, and made various other innovations, against which a great number of his subjects were deeply prejudiced. He also disbanded the strelitzes, who had served as a body-guard of the Czars. In 1700 he formed an alliance with the Kings of Poland and Denmark against Charles XII. of Sweden, who defeated the Russians at Narva in the same year. Peter founded Saint Petersburg in 1703, and prosecuted vigorously the war against Charles, who was defeated at the decisive battle of Pultowa, in 1709. (See CHARLES XII.) In 1711 he married Catherine, a girl of obscure origin, who had been taken prisoner at Marienburg. (See CATHERINE I.)

The war between Russia and Turkey having been renewed, Peter conducted an army in person across the Pruth into the dominions of the Sultan. Hemmed in by the Turkish army, and unable to obtain a regular supply of provisions, he was reduced to a dangerous situation, from which, it is said, the empress Catherine rescued him by overtures of peace and rich presents to the grand vizier. Peter obtained peace by restoring Azof and Taganrog in July, 1711, after which he prosecuted with success the war against the Swedes in Pomerania and conquered Finland. He transferred the senate to Saint Petersburg in 1713, soon after which the imperial palaces of that city were finished. In 1716 he visited Germany, Holland, Denmark, and France. During his visit to Copenhagen he was appointed commander-in-chief of the combined fleets of Russia, Holland, England, and Denmark.

Alexis, the eldest son of Peter, had constantly opposed his projects of reform, and had selected his favourites and advisers among the enemies of his father's policy. Having remonstrated without effect against this conduct, Peter compelled him, in February, 1718, to renounce the succession. Alexis was then tried for conspiracy by a council of judges and bishops, who condemned him to death. The circumstances attending the death of Alexis, attested as they appear to be by unimpeachable witnesses, seem to prove beyond a doubt that he was poisoned by order of his father. (See ALEXIS.)

In 1719 Peter was afflicted by the death of his second son, Peter, the heir-apparent and the issue of Catherine. He made, in September, 1721, at Nystad, (or Neustadt,) a treaty of peace with the King of Sweden, who ceded to him Livonia, Esthonia, Ingria, Carlia, and Viborg. Finland was restored to Sweden by this treaty. Having thus fortunately ended a war of twenty years, he assumed, at the request of the senate, the titles of "Peter the Great, Emperor of all the Russias, and Father of his Country." He afterwards directed his attention to internal improvements, and founded the Academy of Sciences about 1724. The public offices and tribunals had been removed in 1721 to Saint Petersburg, the population of which he had rapidly increased by arbitrary measures. Among his favourite ministers and courtiers were Mentchikof and Galitzin. He died at Saint Petersburg on the 28th of January or the 8th of February, 1725, leaving two daughters, Elizabeth, who became empress, and Anna. Catherine reigned until her death, in 1727, and was succeeded by Peter II., a son of Alexis.

Peter II. (Alexievitch,) a grandson of Peter the Great, was born in 1714 or 1715. He began to reign in May, 1727. His accession was promoted by Mentchikof, who expected to have great power or influence during his minority. Ivan Dolgoruki, however, became the favourite of Peter, who banished Mentchikof to Siberia. Peter died in January, 1730, and was succeeded by Anna Ivanowna.

Peter III. (Feodorovitch,) Emperor of Russia, born in 1728, was a grandson of Peter the Great, and a son of Anna, who was married to the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp. He was recognized as heir to the throne by Elizabeth in 1742, and married, in 1745, Sophia Augusta of Anhalt-Zerbst, who assumed the name of Catherine. He succeeded his aunt Elizabeth in January, 1762. Among his first acts was a treaty of peace with Frederick the Great. Having provoked the enmity of the nobles and clergy by some innovations, he was dethroned and strangled in July, 1762, by conspirators, of whom his wife was an accomplice. (See CATHERINE II.)

Peter (or Pedro, pā'DRO) I., King of Aragon, was a son of Sancho Ramirez. Died in 1104.

Peter (or Pedro) II., King of Aragon, born in 1174, was a son of Alfonso II. Died in 1213.

Peter (or Pedro) III., surnamed THE GREAT, King of Aragon, was born in 1236, and succeeded his father, James I., in 1276. He had married about 1262 Constance, a daughter of Manfred, King of Naples and Sicily. After the death of Manfred, Peter asserted his claim to the kingdom of Naples against Charles of Anjou, who had possession of it and who was supported by the pope. The interest of Peter was promoted by the massacre of the French at the Sicilian Vespers, March 30, 1282, and by several naval victories gained by his admiral, Roger di Loria, over the fleet of Charles. He died in 1285, and was succeeded by his son, Alfonso III.

See ZURITA, "Anales de Aragon;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Peter (or Pedro) IV., surnamed THE CEREMONIOUS, King of Aragon, born in 1317, was the son of Alfonso IV. He began to reign in 1336. Died in 1387.

Peter (or Pedro) I., surnamed THE CRUEL, King of Castile and Leon, born about 1334, succeeded his father, Alfonso XI., in 1350. He married Blanche de Bourbon, a French princess, in 1353, but he soon imprisoned her and married Juana de Castro, whom he also maltreated. The friends of these ladies revolted without success, and Blanche was put to death by order of Peter. About 1366 he was driven out of Castile by Du Guesclin and others, who supported Pedro's brother, Henry de Transtamare, as king. Peter was restored by the English Black Prince in 1367, and was assassinated by Henry de Transtamare in 1369.

Peter the Hermit, [Fr. PIERRE L'ERMITE, pe-air' lĕr'mĕt'; It. PIETRO L'EREMITA, pe-ā'TRO là-rà-mee'tà,] a famous enthusiast, agitator, and crusader, was born in the diocese of Amiens about the middle of the eleventh century. He performed a pilgrimage to Palestine about 1094, and was filled with indignation by the oppressions to which the pilgrims were subjected. On his return he received a commission from Pope Urban II. to preach a crusade against the infidels. He traversed France and other countries barefoot, and by his fervent appeals enlisted a host of crusaders and outlaws estimated at nearly 100,000. He led them as far as Constantinople, and, after the defeat of this rabble near Nice, he accompanied Godfrey to Jerusalem. Nearly all of the rabble perished miserably. He died in Flanders in 1115.

Pe'ter Lom'bard, a distinguished Italian theologian, born in the district of Novara. He was elected Bishop of Paris in 1159. He produced a celebrated compilation of sentences from the Fathers, ("Sententiarum Libri IV.,") which was much used as a text-book, and often reprinted and commented on. Died about 1160. He is often called "the Master of the Sentences."

Having been converted to the Reformed religion, he repaired in 1542 to Zurich, where he acquired the friendship of Bullinger. He afterwards became professor of theology at Strasburg, having the celebrated Bucer for his colleague. At the invitation of Edward VI., he visited England, and was appointed in 1549 professor of divinity at Oxford. Soon after the accession of Mary, he left England, and was invited to fill the chair of theology at Zurich. As a Protestant writer he is esteemed second only to Calvin, whom he is said to have surpassed in learning, and his virtues and eloquence were eulogized by Catholics as well as Protestants. He was the author of several commentaries on the Scriptures, and other theological works. Died at Zurich in 1562.

Pe'ter Mon'gus, [Gr. Πέτρος ὁ Μογγὸς,] became Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria in 477 A.D. Having been deposed by the emperor Zeno, he was restored in 482. By a compromise or temporizing policy he retained his office until he died, in 490.

Peters, pā'tẹrs, (BONAVENTURE,) a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1614, was the best marine painter of his time. His favourite subjects were storms and shipwrecks. He also painted views of the sea in a calm. Died at Antwerp in 1652.

Peters, pā'tẹrs, (CHRISTIAN AUGUST FRIEDRICH,) a German astronomer, born at Hamburg, September 7, 1806. He became in 1839 a director of the observatory at Pulkova, in 1849 professor of astronomy at Königsberg, and in 1854 director at Altona, in which year he began to edit that important work, "Die astronomischen Nachrichten." Died in 1880.

Peters, (CHRISTIAN HENRY FREDERICK,) a German-American astronomer, born at Coldenbüttel, in Sleswick, September 19, 1813. He was educated in Berlin, and travelled extensively in the Mediterranean region, after which he was employed on the United States coast survey. In 1858 he was chosen professor of mathematics at Hamilton College, Clinton, New York, and director of the Litchfield observatories. Dr. Peters discovered a large number of asteroids, and performed a vast amount of important astronomical work. Died July 19, 1890.

Peters, (GERARD.) See PIETERS.

Peters or Peter, (HUGH,) an English dissenting minister, born in Cornwall in 1599. He preached in Salem, Massachusetts, several years, between 1635 and 1641. On his return to England he became a partisan of the Parliament, acquired much influence, and was a preacher to the army which fought against the king. He was tried for treason and hung by the royalists in 1660. His reputation is defended by some respectable writers.

See S. PETERS, "History of Hugh Peters," 1807.

Peters, (JAN,) an excellent Flemish marine painter, a brother of Bonaventure, noticed above, was born at Antwerp in 1625. His figures are well designed and his landscapes finely touched. Among his master-pieces is the "Port of Oran." Died in 1677.

Pe'tẹrs, (JOHN CHARLES,) M.D., an American homœopathic physician, born in New York in 1819, published a "Treatise on Diseases of the Head," a "Treatise on Diseases of the Eyes," and other medical works, and was for a time editor of the "North American Journal of Homœopathy." Died October 21, 1893.

Pe'ther, (ABRAHAM,) an English landscape-painter, born at Chichester in 1756, was a son of William Pether, noticed below. He painted moonlight scenes with success. Died in 1812.

His son SEBASTIAN, born about 1790, was also a landscape-painter. Died in 1844.

Pether, (WILLIAM,) an English engraver in mezzotint, and painter, born about 1730, flourished about 1770. He engraved some works of Rembrandt, and some of his own designs.

Péthion. See PETION, (JÉRÔME.)

Pétiet, pā'te-ā', (CLAUDE,) a French administrator, born at Châtillon-sur-Seine in 1749. He was minister of war from February, 1796, to July, 1797, and governor of Lombardy, (1800–02.) Died in 1806.

Pétigny, de, deh pā'tēn'ye', (FRANÇOIS JULES,) a French antiquary, born in Paris in 1801. He received a prize of nine thousand francs for his "Studies on the History, Laws, and Institutions of the Merovingian Period," (2 vols., 1842–44.) Died in 1858.

Pet'I-grū, (JAMES LOUIS,) an eminent American lawyer and statesman, born in Abbeville district, South Carolina, about 1789. He practised law at Charleston, and was attorney-general of South Carolina from 1822 to 1830. He differed from the large majority of the people of his State on the subject of nullification about 1831. He also opposed the secession movement of 1860–61. Died in 1863.

Pétion, pā'te-ôN', (ALEXANDRE,) the first President of the republic of Hayti, was born at Port-au-Prince in 1770. His father was a wealthy colonist, his mother a mulatto. He was sent to France to be educated, and served at an early age in the French army. Afterwards, when the Revolution broke out, he took an active part in the rising of the coloured people, and distinguished himself as an officer of artillery. His humane disposition and pleasing manners gained for him the favour of all classes; and during the period of terror he succeeded in protecting many of the colonists. When the blacks, under Toussaint, began to proscribe the whites and mulattos, Pétion resisted them by arms, but he was soon forced to fly from the island. Returning with General Le Clerc, he fought for some time under the French standard; but, disgusted at length by the cruelties of the French, and especially by their treachery towards Toussaint and their attempt to re-establish slavery, he again joined Dessalines, and on the death of the latter was elected President of the southern and western portion of the island, while Christophe, who had been general-in-chief under Dessalines, became ruler of the northern part. Pétion was a man of sincere and deep religious convictions. As a ruler he was distinguished for the republican simplicity of his manners and mode of life, as well as for his humanity and impartial justice. But the anxieties caused by the difficulties of his position, in the midst of a population hitherto wholly unaccustomed to self-control,—anxieties which were still further increased, on his part, by an extreme and almost morbid conscientiousness,—proved too much for his health. He died, universally lamented, on the 29th of March, 1818. As a military officer, he was remarkable for skill and serene courage. For some very interesting particulars respecting President Pétion, the reader is referred to numbers 48 and 49 of volume xxxix. of "The Friend," (1866,) published in Philadelphia. The article in question is from the pen of Stephen Grellet.

See SAINT-REMI, "Pétion et Haïti," Paris, 5 vols., 1854–58.

Petion (or Péthion) de Villeneuve, pā'te-ôN'* deh vēl'nuv', (JÉRÔME,) a French revolutionist, born at Chartres in 1753. He was a radical member of the National Assembly in 1790. His abilities were mediocre. He was one of the three deputies sent to conduct the king from Varennes to Paris in 1791, and was censured for his harshness or rudeness to the royal captives. In November, 1791, he was elected mayor of Paris, in preference to La Fayette, who was supported by the moderate reformers. He appears to have been remiss in his duties during the massacres of August and September, 1792. Having been elected to the Convention, he acted with the Girondists, and was proscribed about the 1st of June, 1793. He escaped to the department of the Gironde, where he was found dead in a field in June, 1794. The manner of his death was not ascertained.

See REGNAULT-WARIN, "Vie de J. Petion, Maire de Paris, 1796; LAMARTINE, "History of the Girondists."

Petis de la Croix, peh-te' deh lă krwă, (ALEXANDRE LOUIS MARIE,) a French Orientalist, born in Paris in 1698, was a son of François, (1653–1713.) He was professor of Arabic in the Royal College. Died in 1751.

Petis de la Croix, (FRANÇOIS,) a French Orientalist, born in 1622. He was interpreter to the king, and published a "History of Genghiz-Can," (Jengis Khan,) (1710.) Died in 1695.

Petis de la Croix, (FRANÇOIS,) an Orientalist, born in Paris in 1653, was a son of the preceding. He studied Arabic, Persian, and Turkish at Aleppo, Ispahân, and Constantinople. As interpreter, he rendered important services in the negotiations between the French court and the Sultan and the Dey of Algiers. In 1695 he became interpreter to the king. He translated from the Persian "The Thousand and One Days," (5 vols., 1710–12,) and a "History of Taimoor," (Tamerlane,) (4 vols., 1722.) Died in 1713.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Petit, peh-te' or p'te, (ALEXIS THÉRÈSE,) a French natural philosopher, born at Vesoul in 1791, was a brother-in-law of Arago. He became a teacher of physics in the Polytechnic School in 1810, and titular professor in the same in 1815. He wrote an able "Memoir on the Use of the Principle of Living Forces in the Calculation of Machines," (1818.) Died in 1820.

See J. B. BIOT, "Notice sur Petit," 1821.

Petit, (ANTOINE,) an eminent French physician, born at Orléans in 1718. He became professor of anatomy at the Jardin du Roi, Paris, in 1768, and attracted a large concourse of auditors. He published "Palfyn's Surgical Anatomy, with Notes," ("Anatomie chirurgicale de Palfyn, avec des Notes," 1753.) Died in 1794.

Petit, (JEAN LOUIS,) a celebrated surgeon, born in Paris in 1674. He served as army surgeon from 1692 to 1700, and then returned to Paris. His success was great as a lecturer and a practitioner. He was for some years the most celebrated surgeon in Europe. "The services which he rendered to surgery," says a French writer, "are immense." He was one of the founders of the Academy of Surgery, (1731.) His chief work is an excellent "Treatise on Surgery," ("Traité des Maladies chirurgicales," etc., 3 vols., 1774.) Died in 1750.

Petitain, pẹh-te'tăn', (LOUIS GERMAIN,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1765. He wrote some works of fiction. Died in 1820.

Petitot, pẹh-te'to', (CLAUDE BERNARD,) a French littérateur, born at Dijon in 1772. He translated the dramatic works of Alfieri, (4 vols., 1802,) and edited the works of Racine, (5 vols., 1805,) and the works of Molière, (6 vols., 1813.) Died in 1825.

Petitot, (JEAN,) an eminent painter on enamel, born, of French parents, at Geneva in 1607. He visited England, where he obtained from the chemist Mayern some important secrets respecting colours, and was patronized by Charles I. He painted portraits of the royal family, and copied some works of Van Dyck. About 1650 he returned to France. He received a pension from Louis XIV., whose portrait he painted many times. By order of the king, Bossuet attempted to convert Petitot to the Romish Church, but failed. His master-piece is a whole-length portrait, in enamel, of the Countess of Southampton, the dimensions of which are about nine inches by five. His works are remarkable for delicacy of design and harmonious richness of colour. Died at Vevay in 1691.

See L. BRIGHTWELL, "By-Paths of Biography;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Petitot, (LOUIS MESSIDOR LEBON,) a French sculptor, born in Paris in 1794. He gained the grand prize in 1814, and went to Rome with a pension. Among his works are many marble busts of Frenchmen. His capital work is a colossal monument to Louis Bonaparte at Saint-Leu. He was a member of the Institute. Died in June, 1862.

Petrarca. See PETRARCH.

Pe'trarch, [It. PETRARCA, pȧ-trar'kȧ; Fr. PETRARQUE, pȧ'trȧrk'; Lat. PETRAR'CHA,] (FRANCESCO,) a celebrated Italian poet, was born at Arezzo, in Tuscany, on the 20th of July, 1304. His father, a friend of Dante, was banished from Florence in 1302 for his political principles, and removed in 1313 to Avignon, which was then the residence of the pope. He was sent to study law at Montpellier, where he remained about four years, (1318–22;) but he preferred the study of the classic authors, especially Cicero and Virgil. He made, however, some progress in law under Cino da Pistoia at Bologna. His fine personal and mental endowments procured for him admission into the brilliant society of Avignon. He was so handsome as to attract observation as he walked in the streets. He was patronized by Cardinal Colonna, and was an intimate friend of Giacomo Colonna, a brother of the cardinal.

In 1327 his heart for the first time was touched by a violent and profound passion. He has recorded the place, the day, and the hour in which he first saw Laura de Sade, a daughter of Audibert de Noves, and the wife of Hugh de Sade,—a lady distinguished by her rank, but more by her beauty and modesty. With consummate tact, she contrived, by a mixture of reserve, discretion, and sympathy, to preserve him and herself from the fatal consequences of his wayward passion. "She took my heart into her hand," he writes, "saying, 'Speak no word of this.'" By her pure and excellent example his passion appears to have been purified and exalted; but his admiration of her never abated, and the whole tenor of his life was changed by her influence. He sought relief by the composition of the sonnets and canzoni which have rendered the name of Laura immortal. She accepted this homage, which the usage of that age sanctioned, and was, perhaps, proud of his admiration. He passed much time in collecting, collating, and copying ancient manuscripts. We owe to him the preservation of many Latin authors which were buried in the dust of monastic libraries. About 1335 he visited Rome, the ruins of which made a deep impression on him. He also travelled in France, Germany, and Spain. He discovered two orations of Cicero at Liege, the "Institutions" of Quintilian at Arezzo, and Cicero's "Familiar Letters" at Verona. Petrarch corresponded with the most eminent scholars of his time, founded the library of Saint Mark at Venice, and was one of the principal revivers of classical literature in Italy.

About 1336 he retired to Vaucluse, a romantic valley near Avignon, where he passed several years in solitude and in vain efforts to forget his unhappy passion. Here he meditated a great work which should be worthy of his genius, and commenced a Latin epic poem, of which Scipio Africanus was the hero. This poem, entitled "Africa," is inferior to his Italian sonnets. In 1340 he accepted an invitation from the Roman senate to come to Rome and receive the laurel crown of poetry. He was crowned at the Capitol in 1341. Petrarch appears to have had much influence with several potentates of his time. He exerted his eloquence to induce successive popes to transfer the papal court from Avignon to Rome. He was the colleague of the famous Rienzi in an embassy sent by the Romans to Clement VI. for that purpose. He became Archdeacon of Parma, and canon of several cathedrals. His love of independence caused him to decline the office of apostolic secretary and the dignity of bishop. In 1342 he met Laura, whose beauty had faded, and who was not happy in her domestic relations. Her husband was jealous and ill-tempered. Laura sang to Petrarch, and parted from him with emotion and regret.

The death of Laura, which occurred in 1348, inspired a new series of beautiful and exquisite sonnets, the melody and pathos of which have probably never been surpassed. It is reported that she died on the anniversary of the day and hour that he first saw her. Between 1350 and 1360 he resided at the court of Visconti, Lord of Milan, who employed him in diplomatic missions to Venice, to the Emperor of Germany, and to the King of France. Among his intimate friends at this period was Boccaccio. In 1370, for the sake of retirement and the restoration of his health, he fixed his residence at Arquà, among the Euganean Hills, north of Padua. He was found dead in his library at Arquà on the 19th of July, 1374.* He left, besides other prose works in Latin, a treatise "On Contempt of the World," ("De Contemptu Mundi,") and many epistles, which are highly prized as memorials of important events which he witnessed. He had composed in praise of Laura above three hundred sonnets and fifty canzoni. Among his most perfect productions is "The Triumph of Death," ("Trionfo della Morte,") a poem, in which he describes the death of Laura. The most complete edition of Petrarch's works is that published at Bâle, (2 vols. fol., 1581.) It contains, besides his Italian and Latin poems, and the works already named in this notice, "De Vera Sapientia," "De Officio et Virtutibus Imperatoris," and "Vitarum Virorum Illustrium Epitome."

"The peculiar charm of Petrarch's character," says one of his biographers, "is warmth of heart and a native ingenuousness of disposition, which readily laid bare his soul to those around." He was a believer in revealed religion; but he often protested openly against the corruptions of the papal court.

Petrazzi, pä-trät'see, (Astolfo,) an Italian painter of the Siennese school, was born in 1579; died in 1653.

* His epitaph, as given by some writers, is a curious specimen of Latin versification,—rhyming hexameters:

"Frigida Francisci lapis hic tegit ossa Petrarchæ.
Suscipe Virgo Parens animam; Sate Virgine parce;
Fessaque jam terris cœli requiescat in arce."

(See "Bibliotheca Vetus et Nova," by G. M. König, Altdorf, 1678.)

The following is a nearly literal translation: "This stone covers the cold bones of Francis Petrarch. Virgin Mother, receive his soul; O thou Son of the Virgin, have mercy; and may [his soul,] weary with earth, now find repose in the citadel of heaven."

Petre, pēt'tr or pe'tęr, (Edward,) an English Jesuit, born about 1631. He was confessor or clerk of the closet to James II., over whom he is said to have exerted an evil influence in political affairs. Died in 1699.

Petre, (Sir William,) an English statesman, born in Devonshire. He became a Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, in 1523, and afterwards master of requests. About 1543 he was appointed secretary of state. He held a high office in the reign of Edward VI., and was secretary of state during the reign of Mary. Died in 1572.

Pe-tre'I-us, (Marcus,) a Roman general, to whom the victory over Catiline (62 B.C.) is ascribed. He was a partisan of the senate in the civil war, fought against Cæsar at Pharsalia, and commanded (with Afranius) in Spain, where he was defeated by Cæsar in 49 B.C. He killed himself in Africa in 46 B.C., or was killed by Juba in accordance with an agreement that they should kill each other.

Petrella, pà-trel'lâ, (Enrico,) an Italian musical composer, born at Palermo in 1813. He produced a number of operas, chief among which are "Le Precauzione," "Ione," (1856,) "Giovanna II di Napoli," (1869,) and "I Promessi Sposi," (1869.) Died in 1877.

Petrettini, pà-trĕt-tee'nee, (Spiridion,) an Italian classical scholar, born at Corfù in 1777, became a resident of Venice. He translated Velleius Paterculus into Italian. Died in 1833.

Petri, pā'tree, [in Flemish, Peeters, pā'tęrs,] (Bartholomew,) a Flemish theologian, born in Brabant about 1545. He was professor at Louvain and Douai. Died in 1630.

Petri, pā'tree, (Bernhard,) a German rural economist, born at Deux-Ponts in 1767. He wrote several works on the raising of sheep, and made improvements in the rural economy of Germany. Died in 1842.

Petri, pā'tree, (Christiern,) a Danish divine, who published in 1529 a Danish version of the New Testament.

Petri, pā'tree, or Peterson, pā'tęr-son, (Lars,) the first Protestant Archbishop of Upsal, was born at Oerebro in 1499. He studied under Luther at Wittenberg, and became archbishop in 1531. With the aid of his brother Olaus and L. Andreæ, he produced a Swedish translation of the Bible, (1541.) He published several works of theology. Died in 1573.

See "Biographiskt-Lexicon öfver namnkunnige Svenska Män."

Petri, (Olaus,) a brother of the preceding, was born in 1497, and was a zealous preacher of the Reformed religion. He became first minister of Stockholm in 1539. He published some religious works. Died in 1552.

Petri, pā'tree, (Suffrid or Suffridus,) a Dutch philologist, born in Friesland in 1527. He obtained a chair of law at Cologne in 1577. He was very learned, but was deficient in taste and critical ability. Among his works are "Orations on the Utility of the Greek Language," (1566,) and "On the Writers of Friesland," ("De Scriptoribus Frisiæ Decades," 1593.) Died at Cologne in 1597.

See Nicéron, "Mémoires:" Vossius, "De Historicis Latinis."

Petrie, pee'tre, (Dr. George,) an Irish antiquary, born at Dublin in 1791, was the author of an "Essay on the Round Towers of Ireland," which obtained for him the gold medal of the Royal Irish Academy. He also published an "Essay on the Military Antiquities of Ireland." Died in 1866.

Petrie, pee'tre, ? (Henry,) an English antiquary, born in 1768, became keeper of the chancery records in the Tower. He collected materials for the history of Great Britain, of which two volumes were published, (1830-48.) Died in 1842.

Petroni or Petronj, pā-tro'nee, (STEFANO EGIDIO,) an Italian poet, born near Perugia in 1770. Among his works is "The Napoleonid: a Lyrical-Numismatical Poem," ("La Napoléonide; Poème lyrique-numismatique," 1810.) Died about 1845.

Pe-tro'nĭ-us, [Fr. PÉTRONE, pā'trŏn',] or, more fully, Petro'nius Ar'biter, a licentious Latin writer, supposed to have lived in the reign of Nero. He described the vices of his time in a satire or novel, in mingled prose and verse, entitled "Satyricon," fragments of which are extant. His style is classical, and the work displays much talent, but is extremely licentious. The author of this is supposed to be identical with Petronius, a refined voluptuary who figured at the court of Nero as arbiter elegantiæ, (umpire of fashion and taste,) and who killed himself in 66 A.D.

Pfeiffer, fī'fẹr, (CARL,) a skilful architect, born in Brunswick, Germany, in 1834. At the age of sixteen he came to the United States, and passed several years as assistant architect in Ohio and other parts of the West. He afterwards spent four years in the same capacity in the city of New York. In 1864 he commenced business on his own account, and soon acquired a high reputation as an excellent architect. Among the buildings designed and erected by him are the church of the Messiah, the Roosevelt Hospital, and the mansion of Mr. Barroda, one of the largest houses in New York, and, for its admirable arrangement, probably unsurpassed, if not unequalled, by any other private dwelling in the United States. His plans were accepted for the City Hospital and other public buildings belonging to New York city.

Pfeiffer, pfīf'fẹr, (FRANÇOIS LOUIS,) a Swiss general, born at Lucerne in 1716. He served with distinction in the French army, (1734–75.) Died in 1802.

Pfeiffer, pfīf'fẹr, (EMILY,) an English poetess. Since 1873 she has published numerous volumes of verse, which have won much praise. Her sonnets are especially fine. Died in 1890.

Pfeiffer, (IDA, (née Reyer,) a celebrated German traveller, born in Vienna in 1797. She set out in March, 1842, for Asia Minor, where she spent nearly a year, and in 1845 made the tour of Sweden, Norway, and Iceland. In 1846 she undertook a journey round the world, which she accomplished in a little more than two years, after encountering great hardships and dangers. She published in 1850 "A Woman's Journey round the World, from Vienna to Brazil, Chili, Tahiti, China, Hindostan," etc. In 1851 she entered upon a second journey, having received for this purpose a sum of money from the Austrian government. Her account of this expedition appeared in 1855, under the title of "A Second Voyage round the World, from London to the Cape of Good Hope, Borneo, the Moluccas, California, Peru, and the United States." Died in 1858.

Phæax, fee'aks, [Φαίαξ,] an Athenian orator, who was sent as ambassador to Sicily in 422 B.C. He is mentioned by Plutarch as one of the two persons capable of competing in some degree with Alcibiades,—i.e. when the latter first entered the public service.

Phædon, fee'don, or Phædo, fee'do, [Φαίδων,] a Greek philosopher, born at Elis. He came to Athens about 400 B.C., and was a disciple of Socrates, after whose death he founded a school of philosophy at Elis. His writings have not come down to us. The name of Phædon is the title of a celebrated dialogue of Plato.

See DIOGENES LAERTIUS: SUIDAS, "Phædon."

Phædra, fee'drạ, [Gr. Φαίδρα; Fr. PHÈDRE, fȧdr,] a daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë, was the wife of Theseus, King of Athens. She is said to have indulged a guilty passion for her step-son Hippolytus, and to have caused his death by a false accusation.

Phædrus, fee'drus, [Gr. Φαίδρος; Fr. PHÈDRE, fȧdr,] a Greek Epicurean philosopher, was a friend of Cicero. He was the head of the Epicurean school at Athens from 80 to 70 B.C., and wrote a work which Cicero used freely in composing the first book of his "Natura Deorum."

Phædrus, a Latin fabulist, who wrote about 20 or 30 A.D., was originally a slave. He was probably born in Thrace or Macedonia. It is supposed that he belonged to Augustus, and was liberated by him. He left ninety-seven fables in iambic verse, the subjects and ideas of which are partly borrowed from Æsop. They are admired for the purity and simplicity of the style.

Phā'e-thon or Phā'e-ton, [Gr. Φαέθων; Fr. PHAËTHON, fȧ'ȧ'tôN',] a mythical personage, called a son of Helios (the Sun) or Phœbus. His name signifies "the Shining." The poets feigned that, in his youthful presumption, he persuaded his father to permit him to guide for one day the chariot of the sun, that he was unable to control the fiery coursers, which ran out of the right course and came too near the earth, that Jupiter killed Phaethon with a thunderbolt, and he fell into the river Po.

Phalanthe. See PHALANTHUS.

Phạ-lan'thus, [Gr. Φάλανθος; Fr. PHALANTHE, fȧ'lôNt',] a Spartan chief, who founded a Greek colony at Tarentum about 708 B.C., and subdued the natives of the adjacent country.

Phăl'ạ-ris, [Gr. Φάλαρις,] a ruler of Agrigentum, in Sicily, notorious for his cruelty. He began to reign about 570 B.C., according to Eusebius and Suidas. He rendered his name infamous by burning his victims in a brazen bull. Tradition adds that he was deposed by Telemachus, the ancestor of Theron, and suffered the same cruel death which he had inflicted on others. Certain epistles ascribed to Phalaris were the subjects of a celebrated controversy between Boyle and Bentley, who demonstrated them to be spurious.

Phar-na-bā'zus, [Gr. Φαρνάβαζος; Fr. Pharnabaze, fȧr'nȧ'bȧz',] a Persian satrap, governed the provinces near the Hellespont, under Darius II. He was an ally of the Spartans in the war against the Athenians, and was defeated by Alcibiades, near Abydos, in 409 B.C. He was defeated in 395 by the Spartans, under Agesilaus, who had invaded his province. Pharnabazus and Iphicrates commanded an expedition to Egypt in 374, which was a failure.

See Xenophon, "Hellenica," books i., iii., and iv.

Pharnace. See Pharnaces.

Phar'na-cēs [Gr. Φαρνάκης; Fr. Pharnace, fȧr'nȧs'] I., King of Pontus, was a son of Mithridates IV., whom he succeeded about 190 B.C. He invaded Galatia in 181, and was opposed with success by Eumenes. He was succeeded by his son, Mithridates V.

Pharnaces II., King of Pontus, was a son of Mithridates the Great. He conspired against his father after his defeat by the Romans, (about 63 B.C.,) and was supported by the army. He made peace with Pompey, who recognized him as King of the Bosphorus. During the civil war of Rome he seized Pontus, and provoked the hostility of Cæsar. He was defeated by the Romans and killed in battle in 47 B.C.

Phavorinus Varinus. See Guarino.

Phear, (Sir John Budd,) an English author, born in Suffolk in 1825. He was admitted to the bar in 1854, was a judge in Bengal 1864–76, and in Ceylon 1877–79. He wrote works on mechanics and hydrostatics, "International Trade," and "The Aryan Village in India and Ceylon," (1880.)

Phelippeaux, de, deh fẹh-le'pō', or Philippeaux, fe'le'pō, (Antoine le Picard—lẹh pe'kȧr',) a French officer, born in Poitou in 1768. He emigrated in 1791, fought against the republic, and procured the escape of Sir Sidney Smith from prison, (1797.) Having entered the British service, he distinguished himself at the defence of Acre, where he directed the artillery, in 1799. Died at Acre the same year.

Phelps, (Almira Hart Lincoln,) an American teacher and educational writer, born at Berlin, Connecticut, in 1793. She was for many years associated with her sister, Mrs. Emma Willard, as teacher of the Female Seminary, Troy, New York, and in 1841 took charge of the Patapsco Institute, Maryland. Among her principal works are "Familiar Lectures on Botany," "Geology for Beginners," (1832,) "Lectures on Natural Philosophy," (1835,) and "Hours with my Pupils," (1859.) Died July 15, 1884.

Phelps, (Austin,) D.D., an American clergyman, born in West Brookfield, Massachusetts, January 7, 1821, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1837, was pastor of the Pine Street Congregational Church, Boston, from 1842 to 1848, and professor of sacred rhetoric in the Andover Theological Seminary from 1848 to 1879. Among his works are "The Still Hour," "The Solitude of Christ," "Studies of the Old Testament," "The Theory of Preaching," "Men and Books," "English Style in Public Discourse," "The New Birth," etc. He was the father of Miss Elizabeth Stuart Phelps (Mrs. Ward). Died October 13, 1890.

Phelps, (Edward John,) diplomatist, was born at Middlebury, Vermont, in 1822. He was professor of law at Yale 1881–85, and United States minister to Great Britain 1885–89. He was one of the government counsel in the Behring Sea arbitration. Died March 9, 1900.

Phelps, (Elizabeth Stuart,) an American writer, a daughter of Professor Moses Stuart, D.D., was born at Andover, Massachusetts, in 1815. She published a number of moral and religious tales, which obtained great popularity. Among these we may name "The Kitty Brown Series," (1850) "The Sunny Side," (1851,) "Peep at Number Five," (1851,) and "The Angel over the Right Shoulder," (1851.) Died in 1852.

Phérécrate. See Pherecrates.

Phe-rĕc'ra-tēs, [Gr. Φερεκράτης; Fr. Phérécrate, fȧ'rȧ'krȧt',] an Athenian poet of the old comedy, wrote about 430 B.C., and was a contemporary of Plato and Aristophanes. Small fragments of his plays are extant. He invented a new metre, called Pherecratic. His diction is elegant, and his plots are ingenious.

Phérécyde. See Pherecydes.

Phĕr-e-çy'dēs, [Gr. Φερεκύδης: Fr. Phérécyde, fȧ rȧ'sẽd',] a Greek philosopher, born at Syros about 600 or 570 B.C., was the teacher of Pythagoras. He is said to have taught the doctrine of Metempsychosis, or the transmigration of the soul.

Pherecydes, an Athenian historian, a contemporary of Herodotus, lived between 490 and 450 B.C. His chief work was a mythological history, in ten books, sometimes entitled Αὐτόχθονες.

Phid'i-as, written also Pheidias, [Φειδίας,] regarded by many as the greatest sculptor and statuary that ever lived, was a son of Charmidas or Charmides. He was probably born at Athens between 500 and 485 B.C. The details of his personal history are very deficient, considering his renown. His principal master was Ageladas, a sculptor of Argos. Among his earlier works were a colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachos, dated about 460 B.C., which stood on the Acropolis for many centuries, and an ivory or chryselephantine statue of Athena at Pellene. Having formed a new style, characterized by sublimity and ideal beauty, he obtained the friendship and patronage of Pericles, who about 444 B.C. began to adorn the Acropolis with works of art. "Phidias was appointed by Pericles superintendent of all the public edifices," says Plutarch, "although the Athenians had other eminent architects."

The sculptured ornaments of the Parthenon, executed by Phidias and his disciples, exhibited a perfection which has never been surpassed, if equalled, by other artists. He formed with his own hand the colossal statue of Minerva which was enclosed within the Parthenon and was dedicated in 438 B.C. It was chryselephantine,—that is, the naked parts were made of ivory and the drapery of gold. The height of this statue was nearly forty feet. It was his most celebrated work at Athens. His other master-piece was a colossal ivory and gold statue of Jupiter at Olympia, (Elis,) which was enclosed in the temple dedicated to that god. He was represented seated on a throne, holding in his right hand a statue of Victory. This figure, in the opinion of the Greeks, expressed and realized their highest ideal of supreme majesty and divine complacency. It was destroyed by fire at Constantinople about 475 A.D. Some of the Elgin marbles in the British Museum are considered to be works of Phidias.

In the latter part of his life, Phidias was accused of defrauding the state of part of the gold appropriated to the statue of Minerva; but, as Pericles ordered the gold to be taken off and weighed, this charge was abandoned; for Phidias, by the advice of Pericles, had artfully contrived that the gold could be easily taken off. According to Plutarch, he died in prison, into which he was thrown on a charge of impiety, because he had sculptured on the shield of Minerva images of himself and Pericles. Some writers ascribe his death to poison, and others doubt the truth of the statement that he was imprisoned. His death, however, occurred about 432 B.C.

"The three greatest architects hitherto known in the world," says Ruskin, "were Phidias, Giotto, and Michael Angelo,—with all of whom architecture was only their play, sculpture and painting their work." In the course of his remarks on Repose as a test of greatness in works of art, Ruskin says, "We shall see by this light three colossal images standing up side by side, looming in their great rest of spirituality above the whole world-horizon,—Phidias, Michael Angelo, and Dante."

See K. O. MÜLLER, "De Phidiæ Vita et Operibus Commentationes tres," 1827.

Phī'don or Pheī'don, [Gr. Φείδων,] a king of Argos and descendant of Hercules, is said to have changed the government of that state to a despotism about 750 B.C. He was the reputed inventor of weights and measures, and is said to have been the first prince who coined silver money. He was deprived of power or defeated by the Spartans and Eleians.

Phī'la, [Gr. Φίλα,] a daughter of Antipater, the Regent of Macedonia, was distinguished for her virtue and wisdom. She was married to Craterus, and after his death to Demetrius, the son of Antigonus. Died in 287 B.C.

Philæni, fe-lee'nī, [Gr. Φίλαινοι,] two Carthaginians and brothers, whose name was rendered memorable by an act of patriotic devotion. When the boundary between Carthage and Cyrene was disputed, the parties agreed that two men of each state should start at the same time and walk or run towards the other, and that the place where they met should be the boundary. The Philæni traversed a greater space than the Cyrenians, who accused the former of unfairness. The Philæni then offered to prove their honesty by a sacrifice of their lives, and were buried alive in the sand.

Phī-lā'grī-us, [Φιλάγριος,] a Greek medical writer of Thessalonica, lived probably in the third century of our era. His works are lost, except small fragments.

Phī-lam'mon, [Φιλάμμων,] a mythical Greek poet and musician, was supposed to be the son of Apollo, the inventor of choral music, and the institutor of the Delphian worship of Apollo.

Philandrier, fe'lŏn'dre-ā', [Lat. PHILAN'DER,] (GUILLAUME,) a French scholar, born at Châtillon-sur-Seine in 1505. He published "Notes on Quintilian," (1535,) and "Annotations on Vitruvius," (1544.) Died in 1565.

Philarète. See PHILARETUS.

Philarète, fe'lā'rȧt', or Phī-lăr'ę-tus, (VASIL DROSOF,) Metropolitan of Moscow, was born near Moscow in 1782. He became Bishop of Revel in 1817, and Archbishop of Moscow in 1820. He published "Commentaries on Genesis," and other works. Died in 1867.

Phī-lăr'ę-tus, [Fr. PHILARÈTE, fe'lā'rȧt',] the reputed author of a small Greek treatise "On the Pulse," which is sometimes attributed to Philotheus.

Phī'le or Phī'lēs, (MANUEL,) a Byzantine poet, born at Ephesus about 1275. He wrote, in barbarous Greek verse, a curious work, Περὶ ζώων ἰδιότητος, ("On the Nature of Animals,") which is extracted mostly from Ælian's "Natural History." Died about 1340.

Phil'e-as, [Φιλέας,] a Greek geographer, born at Athens, lived probably several centuries before Christ. He is quoted by Dicæarchus. He wrote a "Periplus."

Philelphe and Philelphus. See FILELFO.

Phī-le'mon, [Φιλήμων,] an eminent Athenian comic poet, was born at Soli in Cilicia, or at Syracuse, about 360 B.C. He was a rival of Menander, and was the first poet of the new comedy in order of time. He began to exhibit comedies about 330 B.C., and obtained great favour with the Athenians. He gained several victories over Menander in dramatic contests. Fragments of his works are extant. He was a witty and elegant writer. Died about 262 B.C. His son, Philemon, was also a comic poet, but less famous.

Philemon, a Greek grammarian, who lived probably between 600 and 700 A.D., was the author of a "Lexicon Technologicon," part of which is extant.

Philemon, one of the primitive Christians, was a friend of the apostle Paul, who addressed to him an epistle, which is included in the canon of Scripture.

Philepicus. See PHILIPPICUS.

Philetærus, fil-e-tee'rus, [Φιλέταιρος,] an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy. Little is known of his life or works.

Philetærus, the founder of the kingdom of Pergamus. He became king about 280 B.C., and died about 262 B.C., leaving the throne to his nephew Eumenes.

Phī-le'tas [Φιλητᾶς] OF COS, an eminent Greek poet and critic, who flourished between 350 and 290 B.C. He was the preceptor of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote elegies and epigrams, and prose works on grammar. Fragments of his poems have come down to us. He was a favourite model of the poet Theocritus.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie:" N. BACH, "Programma de Phileta Coo," 1828.

Phil'e-us, sometimes written Phiteus, Pytheus, or Phileos, an eminent Greek architect, who lived about 25 B.C. He designed two magnificent edifices in Asia Minor,—viz., the Mausoleum and the temple of Athena Polias at Priene. His colossal group containing a statue of Mausolus is one of the great treasures of the British Museum.

Phil'ī-bȩrt [Fr. pron. fe'le'bair'; It. FILIBERTO, fe-le-bêr'to; Lat. PHILIBER'TUS] I., Duke of Savoy, a son of Amadeus IX., was born in 1464; died in 1482.

Philibert II., Duke of Savoy, a son of Philip II., was born in 1480. He succeeded his father in 1497, and died in 1504, leaving the dukedom to his brother, Carlo III.

Philidor. See DANICAN.

Philieul, fe'le-ŭl', (VASQUIN,) a French littérateur, was born at Carpentras in 1522. He published "Laure d'Avignon," (1548,) and "Toutes les Œuvres vulgaires de F. Pétrarque," (1555.) Died about 1582.

Phī-lī'nus, [Φιλῖνος,] a Greek physician, born in Cos, was a pupil of Herophilus. He lived about 250 B.C., and wrote a treatise on botany, which is not extant. He was the reputed founder of the sect of Empirici.

Philinus, an Athenian orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes.

Philinus, a Greek historian, who accompanied Hannibal in his campaign in Italy, and wrote a History of the First and Second Punic Wars, which is not extant. He was a native of Sicily.

Phil'ip [Gr. Φίλιππος] I., King of Macedonia, a son of Argæus, reigned in the ninth century B.C. He was succeeded by his son Aëropus.

Philip [Gr. Φίλιππος; Lat. PHILIP'PUS; Fr. PHILIPPE, fe'lèp'; It. FILIPPO, fe-lèp'po; Sp. FELIPE, fȧ-lee'pȧ; Ger. PHILIPP, fil'ip] II., a famous king of Macedonia, a younger son of Amyntas, was born in 382 B.C. In his youth he passed several years at Thebes as a hostage, and enjoyed the society of Epaminondas. He succeeded his brother Perdiccas in 359, and married Olympias, a daughter of the King of Epirus. During the Social war, which began in 358 B.C., he extended his dominions by the capture of Amphipolis, Potidæa, and Pydna from the Athenians. He availed himself of another civil war, called the Sacred war, to pursue his ambitious projects against the independence of the Grecian states, and became the ally of the Thebans against the Phocians and Athenians. In 347 B.C. he besieged Olynthus with success, and made a treaty of peace with Athens. By the conquest of Phocis, in 346, he acquired a vote in the Amphictyonic Council. The continued aggressions of Philip again involved him in a war with the Athenians, who were stimulated by the powerful appeals of Demosthenes, and who in 339 B.C. compelled him to raise the siege of Perinthus and Byzantium. A league was then formed against him by the Athenians, Thebans, and others. The decisive battle of Chæronea, where Philip, commanding in person, defeated the allies in 338 B.C., rendered him master of Greece. He treated the Athenians with clemency. He called a general congress of deputies from the Greek states, who resolved to unite in an aggressive war against Persia, and appointed Philip commander-in-chief. During the preparations for this enterprise he was assassinated, in 336 B.C., at the celebration of a marriage between his daughter Cleopatra and the King of Epirus. The assassin was Pausanias, a soldier of his own bodyguard, who had been insulted by Attalus, an uncle of Philip's queen, and whose claim for redress had been neglected by the king. Philip possessed great military and political talents, with some virtues, among which we may name generosity. He was, on the other hand, sensual, unscrupulous, and perfidious.

Philip III. OF MACEDON. This title was given to Arrhidæus, an illegitimate son of Philip II. (See ARRHIDÆUS.)

Philip IV. OF MACEDON, a son of Cassander, reigned only a few months, and died in 296 B.C.

Philip V. OF MACEDON, born about 235 B.C., was a son of Demetrius II. He succeeded his uncle, Antigonus Doson, in 220 B.C. Having obtained command of the army of the Achæan league, he displayed superior military talents, and defeated the Ætolians and Spartans, (218–217.) The success of Hannibal at Cannæ tempted Philip to form an alliance with him against the Romans in 215 B.C. He is said to have poisoned Aratus, who had been his friend. The Romans, having recovered their ascendency, sent an army against Philip, who was defeated completely by T. Q. Flamininus at Cynoscephalæ in 197 B.C. He died in 179 B.C., leaving the throne to his son, Perseus. Philip was an able monarch, but was cruel and tyrannical.

See LIVY, "History of Rome," books xxii.–xl.

Philip or Philip'pus, a son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, became tetrarch of Gaulonitis, Tracbonitis, and Batanæa. Died about 34 A.D.

Philip [Lat. PHILIP'PUS] OF ACARNANIA, a physician, was a friend of Alexander the Great, whom he cured of a fever caused by bathing in the river Cydnus, 333 B.C. On this occasion Parmenio warned the king by letter that Philip was bribed (by Darius) to poison him. The king, however, confiding in his fidelity, drank the medicine as he showed the letter to Philip. (See ALEXANDER.)

Philip, Emperor of Rome. See PHILIPPUS.

Phil'ip, [Gr. Φίλιππος; Lat. PHILIP'PUS; Fr. PHILIPPE, fe'lèp',] SAINT, one of the twelve apostles, was a native of Bethsaida, on the Sea of Galilee. He witnessed the miracle of the loaves and fishes, (John vi. 5–7.) The evangelist John records an interview between him and certain Greeks, in chapter xii. 21. According to tradition, he preached in Phrygia, and suffered martyrdom at Hierapolis.

Philip, [Ger. PHILIPP, fil'ip,] Duke of Suabia, Emperor of Germany, a son of Frederick Barbarossa, was born about 1170. He was elected emperor in 1198, but his title was contested by Otho IV., and a civil war ensued. The pope favoured Otho, and excommunicated Philip, but was afterwards reconciled to him. Philip was assassinated in 1208.

Philip [Sp. FELIPE, fȧ-lee'pȧ] I., surnamed THE HANDSOME, King of Castile, a son of Maximilian I., Emperor of Germany, was born at Bruges in 1478. His mother was Mary of Burgundy, from whom he inherited the seventeen provinces of the Low Countries. He was styled Archduke of Austria in his youth. In 1496 he married Joanna, a daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, (of Castile and Aragon.) On the death of Isabella (1504) the crown of Castile was inherited by Joanna, but, in consequence of her mental imbecility, or insanity, Philip exercised the royal power. He died at Burgos in September, 1506, leaving two sons, who became emperors as Charles V. and Ferdinand I.

See MARIANA, "De Rebus Hispanicis;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Philip [Fr. PHILIPPE, fe'lèp'] I., King of France, a son of Henry I. and Anne of Russia, was born in 1052. He succeeded his father in 1060, when Baldwin, Count of Flanders, became regent. He abandoned himself to disgraceful sensuality. In 1092 he married Bertrade, the wife of Foulques, Count of Anjou, who was still living. Philip was excommunicated for this offence. He was involved in a war with William Rufus of England during the first crusade. He died in 1108, and was succeeded by his son, Louis VI.

Philip II. OF FRANCE. See PHILIP AUGUSTUS.

Philip (Philippe) III., surnamed THE BOLD, (LE HARDI, lẹh ȧȧr'de'; Lat. PHILIP'PUS AU'DAX,] born in 1245, was the second son of Louis IX., whose eldest son died in infancy. He married Isabella of Aragon in 1262, and accompanied his father in the crusade to Tunis in 1269. At the death of Louis, in 1270, Philip became king. Having made a treaty of peace with the King of Tunis, he returned to Paris in 1271. Although he was a prince of little talent and of a weak character, the royal domain and power were increased during his reign. Among the chief events of his reign was a war against Peter of Aragon. With the sanction of the pope, who had offered the crown of Aragon to Charles, a son of Philip, the latter invaded Catalonia in 1285, but was soon forced to retreat. He died at Perpignan in October, 1285.

See GUILLAUME DE NANGIS, "Gesta Philippi Audacis;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Philip IV., often called Philip the Fair, [Fr. PHILIPPE LE BEL, fe'lèp' lẹh bȇl; Ger. PHILIPP DER SCHÖNE, fil'ip dĕr shö'nẹh,] a son of Philip III. and Isabella of Aragon, was born in 1268. He succeeded his father in 1285, before which he had married Jeanne of Navarre and acquired Navarre as her dowry. He was ambitious to increase the royal power, and unscrupulous in the choice of means. His favourite advisers were lawyers, who taught him how to substitute despotism for the feudal system. In 1292 or 1293 he summoned Edward I. of England to appear at Paris and answer for the hostile acts of some of his subjects. Edward sent his brother Edmund, who offered reparation, and delivered to Philip six fortresses in Guienne, (1294.) Having occupied all Guienne by his troops, Philip condemned Edward as contumacious, and declared his domains in France confiscated. In the war that ensued, Edward recovered part of Guienne. To raise funds for his wars, Philip debased the coin, and extorted money, by persecution, from the Jews. He invaded Flanders about 1300, but was successfully opposed by the Flemings. By a treaty of 1303 he restored all Guienne to Edward I. Some years before this date a quarrel arose between Philip and the pope, Boniface, whose person was outraged by the agents of Philip at Agnani in 1303. In consequence of Philip's audacious and successful efforts to humble the papacy, the court of the pope was transferred to Avignon in 1308. Among the last acts of his reign was his cruel persecution and suppression of the order of Templars. He died in 1314, and was succeeded by his son, Louis X.

See LESSMANN, "König Philipp der Schöne," 1829; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Philip (Philippe) V., surnamed LE LONG, (lẹh lôn,) the second son of Philip IV., was born about 1293. He became king at the death of Louis X., in 1316. Louis X. had left a daughter, who was excluded from the throne. The important question of succession was decided on this occasion, and the Salic law became thenceforth one of the bases of the French constitution. The events of his reign were not remarkable. He renewed the persecution of the Jews, many of whom were massacred. He died in 1322, leaving four daughters, but no son, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles IV.

Philip (Philippe) VI., or Philippe de Valois, fe'-lệp' dẹh vȧ'lwȧ', born in 1293, was a son of Charles de Valois, who was a brother of Philip IV. He succeeded his cousin, Charles IV. le Bel, in 1328, and became the founder of the royal house of Valois. He was an incapable and prodigal prince. His reign commenced a period of disasters and confusion. He became involved in war with Edward III. of England, who possessed Guienne and claimed to be the rightful heir of the French throne, through his mother Isabelle. Philip was defeated with great loss at Crécy in 1346, and lost Calais, an important strategic point, in 1347, soon after which a truce was concluded. He died in 1350, and was succeeded by his son John.

See FROISSART, "Chronicles;" DE CHOISY, "Histoire de Philippe de Valois," 1688; SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français."

Philip, [Fr. PHILIPPE,] King of Navarre, was a grandson of Philip III. of France. He married in 1318 Jeanne, a daughter of Louis X., who was heiress of the throne of Navarre. He died in 1343, leaving a son, Charles the Bad.

Philip I. OF SPAIN. See PHILIP I. OF CASTILE.

Philip [Sp. FELIPE, fȧ-lee'pȧ; It. FILIPPO, fe-lệp'po] II., King of Spain, was the son of the emperor Charles V. and Isabella of Portugal. He was born at Valladolid on the 21st of May, 1527. By education and character, as well as birth, he was a Spaniard, and a thorough-paced bigot. He married in 1543 Maria of Portugal, who died about three years later. In 1548 he visited Brussels, where Charles V. held his court. In 1554 he went to London to celebrate his marriage with Mary Tudor, Queen-Regnant of England, who was about eleven years older than he. Having parted from her in September, 1555, he went to Brussels to meet his father, who, on the 25th of October, 1555, abdicated in his favour the sovereignty of the Netherlands. Before the end of the year, Philip became King of Spain and the Indies by the abdication of his father, and master of an empire "on which the sun never set." His favourite minister, in the early part of his reign, was Ruy Gomez de Silva, Count of Melito and Prince of Eboli. Philip found himself, against his will, in a position of hostility to the pope, Paul IV., who in December, 1555, made a treaty with the King of France, in order to drive the Spaniards out of Italy. In 1557 his army gained a complete victory over the French at Saint-Quentin. This war was terminated by the treaty of Cateau-Cambresis, in 1559, and Philip, having appointed Margaret of Parma Regent of the Netherlands, returned to Spain, which he never quitted again.

Soon after the death of Mary Tudor (1558) he married Elizabeth or Isabelle of France, a daughter of Henry II., who had been betrothed to his son, Don Carlos. He transferred his court from Toledo to Madrid, which became about 1560 the permanent capital of Spain. One of the first measures of his reign was to re-enact the atrocious edict of 1550, condemning to death every one who should print, write, copy, keep, buy, sell, or give any book made by Luther or Calvin, and all lay persons who should read or teach the Scriptures. His systematic efforts to suppress religious liberty by the torments of the Inquisition, in all his dominions, provoked a general revolt of the Flemings and Dutch in 1566. (See ORANGE, WILLIAM OF.) In August, 1567, the Duke of Alva arrived in Flanders with an army, and with unlimited power to subdue and punish the insurgents. Among the victims of his bloody régime were the Counts of Egmont and Horn, executed in June, 1568. "The execution of Egmont," says Motley, "remains an enduring monument not only of Philip's cruelty and perfidy, but of his dulness. The king had everything to hope from him, and nothing to fear." Alva defeated the insurgents in several battles, and massacred thousands of non-combatants of both sexes and all ages, but was baffled by the indomitable spirit of the people, and was recalled in 1573. "It was beyond the power of man's ingenuity to add any fresh features of horror to the religious persecution under which the provinces were groaning." (Motley.) In 1568 the king's eldest son, Don Carlos, died mysteriously in prison, where he had been confined for some months. According to De Thou and other writers, he was put to death by the order of Philip.

The effort to subdue the Netherlands was continued by Don John of Austria and Farnese, Duke of Parma, without success. This long war exhausted the finances of Philip and hindered his projects for the conquest of France and England. In 1580 he obtained the crown of Portugal as successor of his uncle Henrique, who died without issue. He instigated the French to rebel against Henry IV., and furnished subsidies to the factious League. For the invasion of England he equipped a fleet of one hundred and thirty or, according to some writers, one hundred and fifty vessels, which sailed in May, 1588, and was called "the Invincible Armada." After this fleet had passed through the Strait of Dover, it was damaged by English fire-ships, and attacked on the 8th of August by Admiral Howard, who sunk and captured many ships. The Spanish admiral retreated northward, and near the Orkneys encountered a violent storm, which dispersed his fleet. About fifty of his vessels were wrecked. (See ELIZABETH.) The war between Spain and England continued many years. Philip died on the 13th of September, 1598, and was succeeded by his son, Philip III.

In person, Philip was meagre and below the middle height. He had a fair complexion, blue eyes, aquiline nose, and a very prominent lower jaw. His temper was morose, his manners reserved and repulsive, but he had great ambition and indefatigable industry.

Philip (Felipe) III. OF SPAIN, a son of Philip II., was born at Madrid in April, 1578. His mother was Anne of Austria. He began to reign in September, 1598. He was timid, indolent, and incapable, but devoted to the intolerant policy of his father. Passing his time chiefly in hunting, in acts of devotion, or formalities of etiquette, he abandoned the direction of affairs to his favourite, the Duke of Lerma. This minister prosecuted the war against the revolted provinces of the Netherlands until the exhaustion of his finances forced him, in 1609, to grant a truce of twelve years (see MAURICE OF NASSAU) and to recognize the independence of the Seven United Provinces. The issue of this long contest demonstrated that Spain was no longer the most powerful kingdom of Europe. The prosperity of Spain was greatly impaired by the cruel expulsion of the Moors, in 1610. The number of these exiles is estimated at about one million. Philip had married Margaret of Austria. He died in March, 1621, leaving the throne to his son, Philip IV.

See WATSON, "History of the Reign of Philip III.," 1783; CESPEDES, "Historia de Don Felipe III.," 1631; AVILA, "Historia de la Vida de Don Felipe III.," 1660; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Philip (Felipe) IV., a son of the preceding, was born in April, 1605, and ascended the throne at the age of sixteen. He submitted himself to the control and ascendency of his favourite the Duke of Olivarez. He renewed the war against the Dutch United Provinces at the expiration of the truce, (1621,) and formed with the Emperor of Germany a league against the Protestants. His intrigues involved Europe in a long war, in which the Spaniards fought against the Dutch, Swedes, French, and English. In maritime war the Dutch obtained a decided superiority. On land the Spaniards were defeated by the French at Rocroy (1643) and other places. Portugal revolted in 1640, and was finally separated from the Spanish monarchy. By the treaty of Westphalia (1648) Spain made peace with her enemies, except the French, who continued the war until 1659. The results of these wars were disastrous to Spain, which lost several colonies, islands, and cities. Philip was twice married; in 1615 he espoused Elizabeth of France, and in 1649 Marie Anne of Austria. He died in September, 1665, and was succeeded by his son, Charles II.

Philip [Fr. PHILIPPE; Sp. FELIPE] V., King of Spain, born at Versailles in December, 1683, was a grandson of Louis XIV., and the second son of Louis, Dauphin of France. In his youth he was styled the Duke of Anjou. He was appointed heir to the throne of Spain and the Indies by the will of Charles II., who died, without a direct heir, in November, 1700. His title was contested by the archduke Charles of Austria, whose claim was enforced by the armies of England, Holland, and Austria in the war of the Spanish succession, which began in 1702. Philip was supported by the French and the majority of the Spaniards, who gained a decisive victory at Almanza in 1707. By the treaty of Utrecht (1713) he was recognized as King of Spain; but he gave up Flanders and Naples to the Emperor of Germany. He married Elizabeth Farnese of Parma in 1714, and chose Cardinal Alberoni as prime minister. Under the influence of a religious melancholy, he abdicated in favour of his son Louis in 1724; but the death of Louis a few months later induced him to resume the royal power. He died in July, 1746, and was succeeded by his son Ferdinand VI.

Philip, [Ger. PHILIPP, fil'ip,] Landgrave of Hesse, surnamed DER GROSSMÜTHIGE, (dĕr gros-müt'ig-ẹh,) ("the Magnanimous,") born at Marburg in 1504, was an able prince, and a constant friend of the Protestant cause. He began to reign at the age of fourteen, and introduced the Lutheran religion into Hesse in 1526. In 1531 he formed with the Protestant princes the league of Schmalkalden, which waged war against Charles V.; but he was forced to submit in 1547 to Charles, who kept him a prisoner for five years. Philip was inclined to toleration in religion. Died in 1567.

Philip, [It. FILIPPO, fe-lèp'po,] Duke of Parma, born at Madrid in 1720, was the second son of Philip V. of Spain. He invaded Italy with a Spanish army in 1742, and attempted to obtain a throne by conquest, but failed. The treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, gave him the duchy of Parma. Died in 1765.

Philip, a celebrated Indian chief, commonly called KING PHILIP. He began a war with the English in 1675, but was killed the following year.

Philip the Bold, [Fr. PHILIPPE LE HARDI, fe'lèp' lẹh /ĭĂR'de',] Duke of Burgundy, born in 1342, was a younger son of John, King of France. He was one of the most powerful French princes during the minority of Charles VI., and was a rival of the Duke of Orléans. He acted as regent while Charles VI. was disabled by insanity. He died in 1404, and left the dukedom to his son, Jean Sans Peur.

Philip the Deacon, one of the primitive Christian ministers, was one of seven men appointed to a special service, (Acts vi. 5.) He preached in Samaria, and instructed the treasurer of Queen Candace of Ethiopia. (See Acts viii. 5–40, and xxi. 8.)

Philip the Fair. See PHILIP IV. OF FRANCE.

Philip the Good, [Fr. PHILIPPE LE BON, fe'lèp' lẹh bŏN,] Duke of Burgundy, a son of Jean Sans Peur, was born at Dijon in 1396. As a partisan or ally of Henry V. of England, he fought against Charles VII. of France from 1422 to 1435. At the latter date he entered into alliance with Charles. Some years before this event he had invaded the territory of Jacqueline, Countess of Hainault, and compelled her to recognize him as her heir in Holland, Zealand, and Hainault. He had inherited Flanders and Artois in addition to Burgundy. He instituted the order of the Golden Fleece. His wife was Isabella, a daughter of John I. of Portugal. He died in 1467 or 1457, and was succeeded by his son, Charles the Bold. Philip was one of the most powerful sovereigns of his time, but had little claim to the epithet of "Good." "He was certainly neither a good nor a great prince," says Motley: "he was an adroit dissembler, a practical politician."

Phil'ip Au-gus'tus, [Fr. PHILIPPE AUGUSTE, fe'lèp' ō'güst'; Lat. PHILIP'PUS AUGUS'TUS,] called Philip II., King of France, born in 1165, was the son of Louis VII., whom he succeeded in 1180. He married Isabella of Hainault, a niece of the Count of Flanders. In the first part of his reign he banished the Jews and confiscated their property. He aided and abetted the sons of Henry II. of England in rebellion against their father. Having taken the cross in 1188, he raised an army and united with Richard I. of England in a crusade. They embarked at Genoa and Marseilles in 1190, passed the winter in Sicily, and arrived at Acre in the spring of 1191. Dissensions or jealousies having arisen between Philip and Richard, the former, on the pretext of ill health, abandoned the enterprise, and arrived at Paris in December, 1191. (See RICHARD I.) A war ensued between Philip and the English king for the possession of Normandy, and lasted until the death of Richard, in 1199. The crimes and incapacity of John of England afforded a favourable opportunity to the ambition of Philip, who extended his dominions by the conquest of Normandy, Anjou, and Touraine, (1204–06.)

In 1213, at the instigation of Pope Innocent III., who had deposed John, Philip prepared to invade England. He was forced to renounce this enterprise by the abject submission of John to the pope, and by the loss of his fleet, which was defeated by the English. He invaded Flanders, the chief towns of which surrendered to his army, and gained in 1214 a decisive victory over the emperor Otho IV. and the Flemings at Bouvines, where he commanded in person. He died in 1223, leaving his throne to his son, Louis VIII.

Philip, (JOHN W.,) an American commodore, was born at New York in 1840, and graduated from the Naval Academy in 1861. He served through the civil war and subsequently, and was captain of the battleship Texas in the engagement with the Spanish fleet, July, 1898. He was afterwards promoted commodore. Died June 30, 1900.

Phil'ips, (AMBROSE,) an English poet and dramatist, born probably in Leicestershire about 1670. Among his early productions were six Pastorals, (about 1708,) and a "Letter from Copenhagen," in verse, (1709,) which was praised by Steele and others. His tragedy "The Distressed Mother" was performed with applause in 1712. It was highly commended in the "Spectator" by Addison and Steele, who were friends of the author. He was an adherent of the Whig party, and an object of Pope's ill-natured satire. He made a translation of Sappho's "Hymn to Venus," which Addison printed in the "Spectator," No. 223. His version of Sappho's "Ode to Lesbia" is praised by Addison, as "written in the very spirit of Sappho." (See "Spectator," No. 229.) He became secretary to Dr. Boulter, Primate of Ireland, in 1723, and for some time represented the county of Armagh in the Irish parliament. In 1733 he became a judge of the prerogative court in Ireland. Died in 1749. The term "namby-pamby" is said to have been first applied to his style.

See JOHNSON, "Lives of the English Poets."

Philips, (CATHERINE,) an English poetess, born in London in 1631. Her maiden name was FOWLER. She translated Corneille's tragedy of "Pompey," and wrote poems, which were published in 1667. She was called by her admirers "the Matchless Orinda." Died in 1664.

He aided Dionysius to obtain power in Syracuse about 405 B.C., soon after which he was keeper of the citadel. About 396 he was banished, because he married a niece of Dionysius without his consent. He was recalled from exile by Dionysius the Younger, over whom he acquired much influence. He used this influence against Plato and Dion, and "employed his talents," says Plutarch, "in defence of the despotic policy." Having been defeated in a naval battle by the party of Dion, in 356 B.C., he was killed, or killed himself to avoid falling into the hands of the victors. He wrote a "History of Sicily," which is lost. His style resembled that of Thucydides. Cicero characterizes him as "creber, acutus, brevis, pæne pusillus Thucydides."

Among his works are portraits of Sir Joseph Banks, Lord Byron, the poets Scott, Coleridge, and Southey, Lord Brougham, Sir Francis Chantrey, and Major Denham. Died in 1845.

Phillips, (Sir THOMAS,) an English antiquary, born in Worcestershire in 1792. He formed a great collection of manuscripts, and wrote antiquarian treatises. Died February 6, 1872.

Phillips, (WATTS,) an English dramatist, born in London in 1829. He began life as a writer and caricaturist on a comic weekly called "Diogenes." In 1856 his play of "Joseph Chavigny" was produced at the Adelphi Theatre, and it was quickly followed by a number of successful dramas, among which may be named "The Dead Heart," "The Poor Stroller," "Camilla's Husband," "Nobody's Child," "On the Jury," etc. Died in London, December 2, 1874.

Phillips, (WENDELL,) an American reformer, distinguished for his uncompromising hostility to the institution of slavery and to oppression in every form, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, November 29, 1811. He graduated at Harvard in 1831, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1834. His sympathies were strongly aroused by the persecution of the early abolitionists, more particularly during the Boston mob, headed by "gentlemen of property and standing," in October, 1835, when Garrison narrowly escaped with his life. In 1836 he joined the abolitionists, relinquishing the practice of law because he was unwilling to act under an oath to the Constitution of the United States. In 1837 a meeting of the citizens of Massachusetts was called in Faneuil Hall for the purpose of expressing public condemnation of the murder of Lovejoy, who fell (November 7) at Alton, Illinois, in defence of the freedom of the press. The pro-slavery feeling in Boston was at that time very strong, and the object of the meeting was in imminent danger of being defeated through the influence of Attorney-General Austin, who asked how Mr. Lovejoy had merited the distinction of being thus commemorated, and whether he had not died "as the fool dieth." At the conclusion of his speech, Wendell Phillips arose, and, in a burst of indignant and powerful eloquence, rebuked the craven and sordid spirit of those who sought to defend or excuse that great crime against the liberty of the press and the rights of humanity. Dr. Channing, who had been chiefly instrumental in calling the meeting on that occasion, often referred to the speech of young Phillips before that vast assembly, many of whom were bitterly hostile to freedom, as "morally sublime." Believing that the Constitution of the United States was an unrighteous compact between freedom and slavery, Mr. Phillips refused to recognize its authority by voting or in any other manner, and maintained that a dissolution of the Union would be the most effectual mode of giving freedom to the slaves. In 1865 he succeeded Mr. Garrison as president of the American Anti-Slavery Society, which position he held until the dissolution of the society, April 9, 1870. Mr. Phillips was for many years an advocate of woman suffrage, prohibition, prison reform, and a greenback currency, and he made many public utterances in support of these movements. He was an accomplished scholar, and one of the most eloquent of American orators. Collections of his letters, speeches, and addresses were made in 1863 and 1869, and it is understood that a third volume will be issued posthumously. He died February 2, 1884.

Phillips, (WILLIAM,) F.R.S., an English mineralogist and geologist, born in London in 1773, was a brother of Richard, noticed above, and was a member of the Society of Friends. He distinguished himself by the accurate measurement of crystals by means of the reflective goniometer. He published "Outlines of Mineralogy and Geology," (4th edition, 1826,) and an "Introduction to the Knowledge of Mineralogy," (1816.) He aided Conybeare in an important work,—"The Geology of England and Wales," (1822.) Died in 1828.

Phill'pots, (EDEN,) novelist, born at Mount Aboo, India, in 1862. He was clerk in an insurance office in London 1880–90. Among his works are "The End of a Life," (1890,) "Some Everyday Folks," (1894,) "My Laughing Philosopher," (1896,) "Children of the Mist," (1898,) etc.

Phill'pŏtts or Phil'pŏtts, (HENRY,) an English bishop, was born at Bridgewater, May 6, 1778, and educated at Oxford. He obtained the living of Stanhope, became Dean of Chester in 1828, and Bishop of Exeter in 1830. He wrote many controversial works. He was regarded as the head of the extreme High-Church party in the House of Lords. Died in September, 1869.

Phī'lo or Phī'lon, [Φίλων,] a son of Antipater, a Greek statuary, who lived about 330 B.C. He made a statue of Zeus Ourios, which stood on the shore of the Black Sea, near Chalcedon.

Philo or Philon, an excellent Greek architect, worked at Athens about 320 B.C. He built the portico of twelve Doric columns of the great temple at Eleusis.

Philo, a physician of the sect of Methodici, is mentioned by Galen. The time in which he lived is unknown.

Philo or Philon THE ACADEMIC, a philosopher, born at Larissa, was a disciple of Clitomachus. He taught philosophy and rhetoric at Rome in the time of Cicero, who was one of his auditors or pupils.

Philo, (Philon,) [Φίλων,] an ancient Greek physician, born at Tarsus in Cilicia, lived probably about the time of Augustus. He wrote, in Greek verse, directions for compounding an antidote called Philonium, which are preserved by Galen.

Philo, (Q. PUBLILIUS,) a Roman general, who was consul in 339 B.C. He procured the passage in that year of the important Publilian laws, which increased the power of the plebeians. He was re-elected consul in 327 and in 320 B.C. In the latter year he defeated the Samnites.

Philo, (Philon,) [Gr. Φίλων,] called also Philo Byzantius, (be-zan'she-us,) a Greek mechanician, who lived in the second century B.C. He wrote a "Treatise on Military Machines and Missiles," part of which is extant,—i.e. the fourth and fifth books,—and a treatise on mechanics.

Philo [Fr. PHILON, fe'lôN'] OF BYBLOS, (HERENNIUS,) a Greek historian and grammarian, who lived between 50 and 125 A.D. Among his numerous works was an account of the reign, or part of the reign, of Hadrian. Suidas says he wrote peri tês basileias Adrianou. Philo made a translation of the History of Sanchoniathon, a Phœnician.

Phī'lo (or Phī'lon) Judæ'us, (ju-dee'us,) [Fr. PHILON LE JUIF, fe'lôN' leh zhü-èf',] ("Philo the Jew,") a Greek philosopher, born at Alexandria, lived between 20 B.C. and 50 A.D. He was a member of the sacerdotal family, and was distinguished for learning and eloquence. He was a man of mature age when he was sent by the Jews of Alexandria on an embassy to Caligula, (40 A.D.) It appears that he was a believer in the Platonic philosophy. He wrote many works on the Jewish religion, on the interpretation of the Pentateuch, and other subjects. He is partial to figurative or allegorical interpretations.

Phī'lo or Phī'lon Thȳ-ą-nĕn'sis, an able geometrician, whose period is unknown. He wrote on curved lines, and lived before 100 A.D.

Phĭ-lo-ch'ą-rē'ŝ, a Greek painter, mentioned by Pliny. He is supposed to be the same as the brother of Æschines, who lived about 340 B.C.

Phĭ-lo-ch'o-rus, [Φιλόχορος,] a distinguished Athenian writer, who states that he held an office at Athens in 306 B.C. He wrote a work on the antiquities, legends, and history of Athens, entitled "Atthis," of which many fragments are extant. Suidas says he was put to death by order of Antigonus. According to some writers, he flourished between 306 and 260 B.C.

Phĭl'o-clēs, [Φιλοκλῆς,] an Athenian tragic poet, born about 468 B.C., was a nephew of the poet Æschylus, whom he imitated. In 429 he gained a victory over Sophocles, who on that occasion exhibited his much-admired "Œdipus Tyrannus." None of the works of Philocles have come down to us.

Philocles, an Athenian architect, (of Acharnæ,) designed the admirable Ionic temple of Athena Polias, built about 333 B.C.

Philocrate. See PHILOCRATES.

Phĭl-loc'ra-tēs, [Gr. Φιλοκράτης; Fr. PHILOCRATE, fe'lo'krȧt',] an Athenian orator, who was one of the chief negotiators of the peace with Philip of Macedon in 346 B.C. He was an opponent of Demosthenes, and favoured the Macedonian party. Having been accused of treason, he went into exile about 342 B.C.

Philoctète. See PHILOCTETES.

Phĭl-oc-te'tēs, [Gr. Φιλοκτήτης; Fr. PHILOCTÈTE, fe'lok'tȧt',] a celebrated Greek archer, who, during the Trojan war, was left on the island of Lemnos, because he was wounded in the foot by a serpent or a poisoned arrow. He is the subject of many legends, one of which ascribes the death of Paris to a shaft from his bow. He was said to have been a friend of Hercules, who bequeathed to him his bow and his poisoned arrows.

See SOPHOCLES, "Philoctetes," a tragedy.

Philodème. See PHILODEMUS.

Phĭl-o-de'mus, [Gr. Φιλόδημος; Fr. PHILODÈME, fe'lo'dȧm',] a Greek Epicurean philosopher and poet, born in Palestine. He lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, who mentions him in a speech against Piso. Cicero condemns his conduct, but recognizes his literary merit. He wrote epigrams, fragments of which are extant in the Greek Anthology.

Phĭl-o-lā'us, [Gr. Φιλόλαος,] a Pythagorean philosopher, born at Crotona or Tarentum, was a disciple of Arcbytas. He flourished about 375 or, according to some authorities, 450 B.C., and wrote on physics. Plato, it is said, purchased some of his writings at a high price, and derived from them materials for his "Timæus."

See AUGUST BÖCKH, "Philolaos des Pythagoräers Leben," 1819; ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Phĭl'o-me'la, [Gr. Φιλομήλα; Fr. PHILOMÈLE, fe'lo'mȧl',] a daughter of Pandi'on, and a sister of Procne. The poets related that she was ravished by Tereus, and afterwards metamorphosed into a nightingale.

See OVID, "Metamorphoses."

Philomèle. See PHILOMELA.

Philon. See PHILO.

Phĭ-lon'ĭ-dēs, [Φιλωνίδης,] an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, lived in the fifth century B.C. He is chiefly distinguished as one of the persons in whose name the early plays of Aristophanes were produced. In the opinion of some critics, he was one of the actors to whom Aristophanes committed his chief characters.

Philopémen. See PHILOPŒMEN.

Philopœmen, fil-o-pee'men, [Gr. Φιλοποίμην; Fr. PHILOPÉMEN, fe'lo'pȧ'mŏn',] an eminent Greek general and statesman, born at Megalopolis, in Arcadia, about 252 B.C., was a son of Craugis. He was instructed by Demophanes and Ecdemus, and chose Epaminondas for his model. His favourite study was the art of war. His name occurs in 222 B.C. as one of the few who resisted Cleomenes, the Spartan, when he attacked Megalopolis by night. The defeat of Cleomenes at Sellasia (221 B.C.) was ascribed to Philopœmen. He was appointed general of the cavalry about 210 B.C., and made reforms in discipline and tactics. In 208 he was elected strategus or general-in-chief of the Achæan League. His reputation was greatly exalted by a victory over the Spartan Machanidas at Mantinea. He defeated Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, in 201 B.C., and again about 192. In 188 B.C. he was appointed commander in a war against Sparta, which had seceded from the Achæan League. He made himself master of the Spartan capital, razed the walls, put to death the prominent men, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus. For these acts of severity he was censured by the Roman senate. In an attempt to reduce Messene to allegiance by arms, he was taken prisoner by the Messenians, and compelled to drink poison, in 182 B.C. He has been styled the last of the Greeks. His memory was cherished with great veneration. According to Pausanias, "Miltiades was the first, and Philopœmen the last, benefactor to the whole of Greece."

Phĭ-lop'o-nus, (JOANNES,) [Gr. Ἰωάννης ὁ Φιλόπονος,] surnamed GRAMMAT'ICUS, a grammarian of Alexandria whose reputation was greater than his merit. His name is chiefly memorable for his connection with the capture of Alexandria by Amroo, 639 A.D. It is reported that he requested the victor to grant him the great library of that city, and that his request was refused.

Philostorge. See PHILOSTORGIUS.

Phĭl-o-stor'gĭ-us, [Gr. Φιλοστόργιος; Fr. PHILOSTORGE, fe'lo'storzh',] an Arian writer, born in Cappadocia about 360 A.D. He wrote an ecclesiastical history of the period from 300 to 425 A.D., which is lost. An extract from it is preserved in a work of Photius.

Philostrat and Philostra. See PHILOSTRATUS.

Phĭ-los'tra-tus, [Gr. Φιλόστρατος; Fr. PHILOSTRATE, fe'lo'strȧt'; Ger. PHILOSTRAT, fee'los-trȧt,] (FLAVIUS,) a Greek biographer, born in Lemnos about 175 or 180 A.D. He became a resident of Rome, where he taught rhetoric in the reign of Septimius Severus. At the request of the empress, Julia Domna, he wrote a "Life of Apollonius of Tyana." This work, which has exercised the ingenuity of many commentators, was printed in 1502. Among his extant works are "The Lives of the Sophists," and a description of a collection of paintings, which displays richness of fancy and beauty of style. He was alive in the reign of Philip, (244–249 A.D.)

See RITTER, "History of Philosophy;" FABRICIUS, "Bibliotheca Græca:" REHFUES, "Ueber den Jüngern Philostrat," etc., 1800; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Philostratus THE LEMNIAN, a Sophist, born about 190 A.D. He is mentioned in the writings of the Philostratus noticed above, who was his friend and praises his rhetorical skill. Suidas ascribes to him a work called Εἰκόνας.

Phĭ-lo'tas, [Gr. Φιλώτας,] a general of Alexander the Great, was a son of Parmenio. He commanded the Macedonian cavalry, or royal guards, in the expedition against Persia, and stood high in the favour of the king. Plutarch extols his valour and generosity, but adds that "the loftiness of his port was altogether extravagant." He received information of a plot against Alexander, but neglected to mention it. His enemy Craterus used this circumstance to excite the suspicion of the king. Philotas was tortured until he confessed his complicity, and was put to death in 330 B.C. His guilt may reasonably be doubted.

See ARRIAN, "Anabasis."

Philotas, a physician of Amphissa, in Locris, born about 50 or 60 B.C. He once supped with Antyllus, (a son of Antony,) who was so pleased with a syllogism of Philotas that he gave him a rich present, (30 B.C.)

Phĭ-lo'the-us, [Φιλοθεός,] (COCCINUS,) a Greek writer, was chosen Patriarch of Constantinople in 1355. He had a high reputation, and wrote a number of works, some of which have been printed. Died about 1373.

Phĭl-o-tī'mus, [Φιλότιμος,] an eminent Greek physician, who lived probably about 300 B.C., was a contemporary of Hieropbilus. His works are mentioned by Galen.

Philoxène. See PHILOXENUS.

Phĭ-lox'e-nus, [Gr. Φιλόξενος; Fr. PHILOXÈNE, fe'loks'ȧn',] an eminent Greek dithyrambic poet, born at Cythera about 435 B.C. He passed some time at the court of Dionysius of Syracuse, who treated him with favour and afterwards sent him to prison. His chief poems were "Cyclops or Galatea," and "The Feast" or "Dinner," (Δεῖπνον,) which were much admired. Fragments of them are extant. He died in 380 B.C.

See BERGLEIN, "De Philoxeno Cytherio Poeta," 1843; KLINGENDER, "Dissertatio de Philoxeno Cytherio," 1845.

Philoxenus, an able Greek painter of Eretria, was a pupil of Nicomachus of Thebes. He was noted for rapidity of execution. His picture of a battle of Alexander with Darius is highly praised by Pliny. He lived about 325 B.C.

Philoxenus, an Egyptian surgeon, mentioned by Celsus as the author of several valuable works on surgery. He probably lived before the Christian era.

Phĭl'pot, (JOHN,) an English Protestant minister, born at Compton, was tried for heresy, and burned at Smithfield in 1555. He left several works on theology.

Phinée. See PHINEUS.

Phĭ'neŭs or Phin'e-us, [Gr. Φινεύς; Fr. PHINÉE, fe'nà',] a blind soothsayer of classic mythology, supposed to be a son of Agenor, (or of Neptune.) According to the ancient fabulists, he treated his children with extreme severity, and the gods, to punish him, sent the Harpies, who annoyed him exceedingly, by snatching and soiling his food, until he was relieved by the Argonauts. In return for this service, he gave them prophetic counsel to direct them in their enterprise. The story of Phineus is related with much variation by different authors, some of whom call him King of Salmydessus in Thrace.

Phipps or Phips, (Sir WILLIAM,) an American magistrate, born in Maine in 1651, became Governor of Massachusetts in 1692. His "Life," by Francis Bowen, is included in Sparks's "American Biography," vol. vii. He commanded an expedition against Port Royal, which he captured in 1690. Died in 1695.

See COTTON MATHER, "Life of Sir William Phipps."

Phlē'gon, [Φλέγων,] a chronologer, born at Tralles, in Lydia, lived in the first half of the second century. He was a freedman of the emperor Hadrian. His most important work is called Ὀλυμπιονικῶν καὶ χρονικῶν συναγωγή. It is not extant. Saint Jerome cites him as a witness to confirm the gospel narrative in relation to the miraculous darkness which occurred at the death of Christ. Phlegon states that in the fourth year of the 202d Olympiad there was a great eclipse of the sun at the sixth hour, and an earthquake in Bithynia.

Phlegyas, flee'je-as, [Gr. Φλεγύας; Fr. PHLÉGYAS, flà'zhe'â',] a fabulous personage, said to be a son of Mars, a king of the Lapithæ, and the father of Coronis. Having set fire to the temple of Apollo, he was killed and doomed to a severe punishment in Tartarus.

Pho'cas, [Gr. Φωκᾶς,] a native of Asia Minor, usurped the empire of Constantinople in 602 A.D. He waged war against Persia, in which he suffered great losses. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty, and was deposed and put to death by Heracli'us in 610 A.D.

Phocion, fo'she-on, or Phokion, fō'ke-on, [Gr. Φωκίων,] an Athenian statesman and general, born about 402 B.C., was a pupil of Plato and Xenocrates. He contributed to the victory of Naxos, in 376. In 340 he commanded an army which operated with success against Philip at Byzantium. He opposed Demosthenes on the question of war against Philip of Macedon, and was the leader of the conservative or aristocratic party. According to Plutarch, he was elected general forty-five times. In his speeches he was remarkable for conciseness and sententious brevity. Demosthenes used to say, when Phocion arose to speak, "Here comes the pruner of my periods." Many of his witty sayings are recorded by Plutarch. He compared the speeches of a certain orator "to cypress-trees, which are high and stately, but bear no fruit." He opposed the war against Antipater in 323 B.C. Having been unjustly condemned on a charge of treason, he was put to death by the popular party in 317 B.C.

"The influence of Phokion as a public adviser," says Grote, "during the period embraced in this volume down to the battle of Chæronea, was eminently mischievous to Athens,—all the more mischievous, partly (like that of Nikias) from the respectability of his personal qualities, partly because he espoused and sanctioned the most dangerous infirmity of the Athenian mind." ("History of Greece," chap. lxxxvii.)

Pho-çÿl'ĭ-dēs [Φωκυλίδης] OF MILETUS, a Greek poet, who flourished about 540 B.C. He wrote didactic and elegiac poems, of which small fragments are extant.

Phœbe, fee'be, [Gr. Φοίβη; Fr. PHÉBÉ, fà'bà',] a surname of ARTEMIS or DIANA, goddess of the moon. (See DIANA.)

Phœbidas, fēb'e-das, [Gr. Φοίβιδας,] a Spartan general, who commanded in the Olynthian war, (382 B.C.) He seized by treachery the Cadmeia of Thebes. He was killed in a battle against the Thebans about 378 B.C.

Phœbus, fee'bus, [Gr. Φοῖβος; Fr. PHÉBUS, fà'büs',] a name given by the Greeks to Apollo as god of the sun. (See APOLLO.)

Phœnix, fee'niks, [Gr. Φοίνιξ; Fr. PHÉNIX, fà'nèks',] a mythological personage, whom tradition represents as King of the Dolopes, and preceptor of Achilles, whom he accompanied to the siege of Troy. The invention of the alphabet was ascribed to him.

Phœnix, [Gr. Φοίνιξ,] a son of Agenor, and brother of Cadmus. It was fabled that he went to Africa to search for his sister Europa, and settled in a country which was from him called Phœnicia.

Phœnix is also the name of a fabulous bird, celebrated among the ancient Greeks and Orientals. According to one tradition, it attained the age of five hundred years or more, and burned itself on a funeral pile, from the ashes of which another Phœnix arose.

Phokion. See PHOCION.

Phor'çÿs or Phor'cus, [Gr. Φόρκυς or Φόρκος,] the old man of the sea, in classic mythology, was said to be the father of the Gorgons, the Grææ, and the Hesperides. The first and second of these were called PHOR'CYDES or PHOR'CIDES, [Gr. Φορκίδες.]

Phor'mĭ-on, [Gr. Φορμίων,] an able Athenian general, who blockaded Potidæa in 432 B.C. He gained a decisive victory over the Peloponnesian fleet near Naupactus, in 429. Died in 428 B.C.

Phormion OF EPHESUS, a Peripatetic philosopher, who is said to have excited the disgust of Hannibal by discoursing in his presence for several hours on the military art.

Phoronée. See PHORONEUS.

Pho-ro'neŭs, [Gr. Φορωνεύς; Fr. PHORONÉE, fo'ro-nà',] a son of Inachus, and a king of Argolis, was the father of Agenor, Pelasgus, and Niobe. According to tradition, he discovered the use of fire.

Photius, fo'she-us, [Gr. Φώτιος,] an ambitious and highly-gifted Byzantine prelate and writer, was born of a noble family probably at Constantinople. He was a man of sound judgment and of profound and various erudition. After he had held several high civil offices, he was proto-secretarius under Michael III. He became in 857 or 858 A.D. Patriarch of Constantinople in place of Ignatius, who was deposed by Bardas. The cause of Ignatius was supported by Pope Nicholas, who anathematized Photius in 862 or 863. A council assembled by Photius excommunicated the pope, and thus originated the great schism between the Western and Eastern Churches. In 867 the emperor Basil I. banished Photius and restored Ignatius, whose rights were confirmed by an œcumenical council in 869. Photius gained the favour of Basil, and on the death of Ignatius, in 877, was restored to his see, and was recognized by the pope, John VIII. A dispute about the jurisdiction of Bulgaria, however, revived the schism between the Greek and Roman Churches. Photius was banished by the emperor Leo VI. in 886 A.D., and died in exile a few years later. He is treated with more favour by Protestant writers than by the Roman Catholics. He was a voluminous author. His most important work, "Myriobiblion, seu Bibliotheca," is a review or critical analysis of ancient Greek authors, and is considered one of the most precious monuments of ancient literature. He also left a Greek Lexicon, which was published in 1808.

Phra-ā'tēs, King of Parthia, a son of Orodes, began to reign in 37 B.C. He restored to Augustus in 20 B.C. the prisoners and ensigns taken from Crassus in 53 B.C.

Phrad'mon [Φράδμων] OF ARGOS, a Greek statuary, who lived about 425 B.C. He produced an Amazon for the temple of Diana at Ephesus, in competition with other eminent artists, several of whom were more successful than he in this trial of skill.

Phran'zą or Phran'zēs, [Gr. Φραντζῆ or Φραντζῆς,] the last Byzantine historian, was born in 1401. He served the emperor Constantine XIII. as a diplomatist and soldier, and was captured by the Turks in 1453. He wrote a "Chronicon," or History, of the period from 1260 to 1477, which is highly prized.

Phra-or'tēs, [Gr. Φραόρτης,] King of Media, reigned from 656 to 634 B.C. He conquered Persia and other parts of Asia. He was killed at the siege of Nineveh, and was succeeded by his son Cyaxares.

Phreas or Freas, frees, ? (JOHN,) a learned Englishman, born in London, studied medicine under Guarini at Ferrara. He produced some translations and poems. Died at Rome in 1465.

Phrÿ-ġil'lus, a very ancient and celebrated engraver of precious stones, was probably a native or citizen of Syracuse.

Phrȳ'ne, [Φρύνη,] an Athenian courtesan, born at Thespiæ, in Bœotia, lived in the fourth century B.C. She was the model of the statues of Venus produced by Praxiteles.

Phrȳn'ĭ-chus, [Φρύνιχος,] an Athenian tragic poet, was a disciple of Thespis. He exhibited a play in 511 B.C., and made important improvements in the drama. He introduced masks representing females, but admitted only one actor. The chorus retained the principal place in his dramas. He gained a prize in 476 B.C. for his "Phœnician Women." His works are not extant.

Phrynichus, a distinguished Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, flourished about 430 B.C. His vigour and elegance are attested by the small fragments of his works which are extant.

Phrynichus, an Athenian general, had a high command in 412 B.C. He co-operated with Theramenes and Antiphon in the revolution by which the Four Hundred came into power, in 411 B.C.

Phrynichus, a Greek grammarian, (called ARRHABIUS by Photius,) lived about 180 A.D. He wrote "Eclogues of Attic Names and Verbs," ("Eclogæ Nominum et Verborum Atticorum,") in which he taught the use of words as sanctioned by writers of the pure Attic diction. This work has been printed.

Phrȳn'nis [Gr. Φρύννις] or Phrȳ'nis, an eminent dithyrambic poet, born at Mitylene, lived about 425 B.C.

Phtha, fthå, or Ptah, ptå, the great god of the people of ancient Memphis, in Egypt. He is said to have stood for the abstract idea of intellectual force. He is frequently identified with Hephæstos, or Vulcan, since he was the artificer of the gods.

Phul or Pul, King of Assyria, reigned from 759 to 742 B.C. Menahem, King of Israel, was tributary to him.

Phull, (KARL LUDWIG,) BARON, born in Würtemberg, became a lieutenant-general in the Russian service, and was the author of several military works. Died in 1826.

Phyfe, (WILLIAM HENRY,) an American philologist, born at New York in 1855. He published "Seven Thousand Words often Mispronounced," "Five Thousand Words often Misspelled," and several works on pronunciation.

Phȳ-lar'chus, [Gr. Φύλαρχος; Fr. PHYLARQUE, fe'lårk',] a Greek historian, born at Athens or Naucratis, in Egypt, lived about 215 B.C. He wrote a History of Greece from 272 to 220 B.C., of which only fragments are extant. His style was graphic and animated. Plutarch's lives of Cleomenes and Agis are said to be copied, or taken without much change, from Phylarchus.

Phylarque. See PHYLARCHUS.

Phȳl'lis, [Gr. Φυλλίς,] in classic mythology, a daughter of Sithon, King of Thrace, was betrothed to Demophoön, a son of Theseus. The poets feigned that she killed herself because he failed to come at the appointed time, and she was changed into an almond-tree.

Phȳ-rom'ą-chus, [Φυρόμαχος,] an able Athenian sculptor, lived about 410 B.C. He made the bas-reliefs on the frieze of the temple Athena Polias. He is probably the same as the Pyromachus mentioned by Pliny.

Phȳs'ick, (PHILIP SYNG,) one of the most eminent of American surgeons, was born in Philadelphia in 1768. His father, Edmund Physick, was keeper of the great seal under the colonial government of Pennsylvania, and, after the Revolution, had charge of the estates of the Penn family. In 1785 he took the degree of A.B. in the University of Pennsylvania. Soon after, he commenced the study of medicine under Dr. Adam Kuhn. It is said that the first time he witnessed the amputation of a limb he fainted, and was obliged to be taken out of the room; but he afterwards succeeded so completely in conquering this weakness of the nerves as to equal, if not surpass, any other surgeon of his time in steadiness of hand and perfect self-possession while performing an important operation. During his attendance at the Philadelphia College of Medicine, he had for his instructors Dr. Shippen and Dr. Rush, who, with Dr. Kuhn, were lecturers in that institution. Early in the year 1789 Mr. Edmund Physick, accompanied by his son, visited London, where the young student was placed under the care of the celebrated John Hunter, by whose recommendation he was subsequently appointed to the post of house-surgeon at Saint George's Hospital. In one of Hunter's papers he compliments Dr. Physick on the accuracy of some physiological experiments which he had performed while house-surgeon at the hospital; and such were the esteem and confidence which the great anatomist entertained for him that he actually invited him, we are told, to remain in London and take a share in his own extensive professional business. But this offer Dr. Physick thought proper to decline. Having in 1791 received his license from the Royal College of Surgeons, in London, he repaired to Edinburgh, where he attended the medical lectures of the University, and in May, 1792, took his degree of doctor of medicine. He returned to Philadelphia in September of the same year. He distinguished himself by his faithful attention to his professional duties during the frightful mortality caused by the yellow fever in 1793. The alarm was so great on that occasion that not only nearly all the citizens, who had it in their power to go away, fled from the city, but many of the physicians left also. Dr. Physick himself had an attack of fever; but it appears to have been comparatively light. In 1798 he received a flattering testimonial to his courage and faithfulness during the epidemic* of that and preceding years, from the managers of the Marine and City Hospitals, accompanied by a present of plate valued at more than a thousand dollars. In 1800 he commenced, in Philadelphia, a course of lectures on surgery, which were continued for several years. His success induced the trustees of the University to establish a professorship of surgery in the medical department of that institution, and to appoint Dr. Physick to the new chair. In 1819 he was transferred from the chair of surgery to that of anatomy, made vacant by the death of Dr. Dorsey. He resigned this position in 1831; and the trustees of the University, on accepting his resignation, unanimously elected him "Emeritus professor of surgery and anatomy." In 1825 he was elected a member of the French Royal Academy of Medicine, and was, it is said, the first American who received this honour. He closed his long and useful life on the 15th of December, 1837. He had married in 1800 Miss Emlen, of Burlington, by whom he had four children.

Piazza, (VINCENZO,) MARQUIS, an Italian poet, was born in the Romagna in 1670. Among his works is the "Capture of Bona," ("Bona espugnata," 1694.) Died at Parma in 1745.

Piazzetta, pe-ât-set'tȧ, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) a distinguished painter, born at Venice in 1682. He was skilful in chiaro-oscuro. His master-piece is "The Beheading of John the Baptist." The shades of his pictures have become too dark, from the effect of time. Died in 1754.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Piazzi, pe-ât'see, (JOSEPH,) an eminent astronomer, born at Ponte, in the Valtelline, Switzerland, in July, 1746. He entered the monastic order of Theatins, and studied under Tiraboschi and Lesueur. In 1780 he became professor of the higher mathematics at Palermo, where he founded an observatory. He visited Paris and London in 1787 and 1788. In 1803 he published a "Catalogue of Fixed Stars," which obtained for him a high reputation as an accurate observer. He discovered, on the 1st of January, 1801, the first of the asteroids, or small planets, whose orbit is between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. He gave it the name of Ceres. Among his works is a "Discourse on Astronomy," (1790.) He became director of an observatory at Naples in 1817. Died at Naples in 1826.

Picard, pe'kȧr', (ERNEST,) a French advocate and radical politician, born in Paris in 1821. He was elected to the legislative body by the voters of Paris in 1858, in 1863, and in 1869. He became minister of finance September 4, 1870. Died May 13, 1877.

Picard, (JEAN,) an eminent French astronomer, born at La Flèche, July 21, 1620. He was a priest and prior of Villé, in Anjou, when he observed with Gassendi the solar eclipse of August 25, 1645. He succeeded Gassendi as professor in the Collége de France in 1655. He was the first who applied the telescope to the measurement of angles, and was the inventor of the lunette d'épreuve. He is said to have invented the transit instrument. His most important work was the measurement of an arc of the meridian of Paris between Amiens and Malvoisine in 1669–70, of which he wrote an account, entitled "La Mesure de la Terre," (1671.) "When he had," says Delambre, "so good reason to regard himself as the first astronomer of France, and even of Europe, he used his influence with Colbert to attract to France Cassini, whose reputation was already established." Died in 1682.

Picard, (LOUIS BENOÎT,) a popular French dramatist, born in Paris in 1769. He produced in 1792 a comic opera called "Visitandines," which had great success. Among his popular comedies, in verse, are "The College Friends," ("Les Amis de Collége," 1795,) "Ordinary and Mean," ("Médiocre et Rampant," 1797,) and "The Ambitious Husband." He wrote dramas, in prose, entitled "The Small Town," ("La petite Ville," 1801,) and "The Puppets," ("Les Marionnettes," 1805.) In 1807 he was admitted into the French Academy. He delineates the manners of his time with much success, and displays a rich fund of witty sallies. Died in 1828.

Picard-Cambridge, (OCTAVIUS,) an English naturalist, born in Dorsetshire in 1828. He became a clergyman, but devoted himself to the study of spiders, and published "Spiders of Dorset," (2 vols., 1879–81,) and other works and papers on the subject of his studies.

Picart, pe'kȧr', (BENOÎT,) a French historical writer and monk, born at Toul in 1663. He wrote a "History of the City and Diocese of Toul," (1707,) and other works. Died in 1720.

Picart, (BERNARD,) a French designer and engraver, born in Paris in 1673. He had a talent for the imitation of various masters, and obtained a high reputation. Having removed to Amsterdam in 1710, he worked for the booksellers, and lapsed into a degenerate manner. He engraved after his own designs, and after Poussin, Le Brun, and others. Died in 1733.

Picart, (ÉTIENNE,) an eminent engraver, called LE ROMAIN, born in Paris in 1631, was the father of the preceding. He worked some years at Rome, and settled at Amsterdam in 1710. His works, which consist of portraits and history, display more firmness than harmony. Died at Amsterdam in 1721.

Piccart, pik'kȧrt, (MICHAEL,) a learned German philologist and philosopher, born at Nuremberg in 1574. He was professor of philosophy at Altdorf. He published, besides other works, a "Commentary on the Political Works of Aristotle," (1615,) which is commended. Died in 1620.

Picchena, pèk-kā'nȧ, (CURZIO,) an Italian philologist, born in Tuscany about 1550. He published a good edition of Tacitus, (1607.) Died in 1629.

Piccini, pèt-chee'nee, (LUIGI,) a musician and composer, born at Naples in 1766, was a son of Niccolò. He composed operas which obtained little success. He was chapel-master to the King of Sweden from 1796 to 1801. Died in 1827.

Piccini, pêt-chee'nee, or Piccinni, pêt-cheen'nee, (NICCOLÒ,) a popular Italian composer, born at Bari, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1728. He studied under Leo and Durante at Naples. His serious opera "Zenobia" (1756) obtained a complete success. His reputation was widely extended by the comic opera "Good Little Daughter," ("La buona Figliuola," 1760,) which some consider his master-piece. In 1776 he removed to Paris, where he produced the operas of "Roland," (1778,) "Atys," etc. A great commotion and wordy warfare was raised by the rivalry between Piccini and Gluck. The French literati and the general public were divided into two parties, the Piccinists and the Gluckists. Piccini became singing-master to the queen Marie Antoinette about 1780. He returned to Naples in 1791. Among his most admired works are "Olimpiade," and the French opera of "Didon," (1783.) Died at Passy, near Paris, in 1800.

Pichegru, pèsh'groo or pèsh'grü', (CHARLES,) a French general, born at Arbois (Jura) in 1761. He entered the army in 1783, and became a zealous partisan of the Revolution in 1789. He was raised to the rank of general of division in 1793, and obtained command of the army of the Rhine in October of that year. About the end of the same year he became general-in-chief of the united armies of the Rhine and the Moselle. He was a favourite of the Jacobins at this period. In February, 1794, he succeeded Jourdan as commander of the army of the North, with which, by rapid and skilful movements, he gained advantages at Cassel, Courtrai, and Menin. In the winter of 1794–95 he crossed the Waal on the ice and reduced Holland to submission. Having taken command of the army of the Rhine in 1795, he incurred suspicion of treason, and was superseded by Moreau in 1796. He continued to intrigue against the Directory, by which he was transported to Cayenne in September, 1797; but he escaped from that place in 1798. He conspired with Cadoudal and others against Bonaparte, and was arrested by the police in Paris in February, 1804. Before his trial was finished, he was found dead in prison, in April, 1804.

Pierce, pẹrss or peerss, (BENJAMIN,) born in New Hampshire in 1757, was elected Governor of that State in 1827 and 1829. He was the father of President Franklin Pierce. Died in 1839.

Pierce, peerss, (EDWARD,) an English painter of history and portraits, lived in the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. Died near the close of the seventeenth century.

Pierce, (FRANKLIN,) the fourteenth President of the United States, was born at Hillsborough, New Hampshire, on the 23d of November, 1804. He was a son of General Benjamin Pierce, who was Governor of New Hampshire. He graduated at Bowdoin College, Maine, in 1824, studied law under Levi Woodbury, and was admitted to the bar in 1827. He practised first at Hillsborough. In 1833 he was elected a member of Congress by the Democrats. Having been re-elected, he served in the House of Representatives until 1837, and in that year was chosen a Senator of the United States by the legislature of New Hampshire. He became a resident of Concord about 1838, and resigned his seat in the Senate in 1842, after which he devoted himself to the practice of law. He had married about 1834. He favoured the annexation of Texas to the United States, (1844–45,) and served in the Mexican war with the rank of brigadier-general, (1846–47.)

At the National Democratic Convention, June, 1852, the prominent candidates for the Presidency were Cass, Buchanan, and Douglas. After thirty-five ballots without decisive result, the name of General Pierce was proposed, and he was nominated on the forty-ninth ballot. His Whig competitor was General Winfield Scott. General Pierce was elected President, receiving two hundred and fifty-four electoral votes out of two hundred and ninety-six, which was the whole number. He appointed W. L. Marcy secretary of state, James Guthrie secretary of the treasury, Jefferson Davis secretary of war, Robert McClelland secretary of the interior, J. Dobbin secretary of the navy, and Caleb Cushing attorney-general. In his inaugural address he denounced the agitation of slavery. Among the important events of his administration were the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the passage of the Nebraska-Kansas bill, which he approved and signed in 1854, and which produced great excitement in the Free States, and the bombardment and destruction of Greytown, in Central America, (July, 1854,) by Captain Hollins, acting under the instructions of the United States Government. In August, 1854, Mr. Pierce directed the American ambassadors, J. Buchanan, J. Y. Mason, and P. Soulé, to meet in some European city and confer on the best means of acquiring Cuba. They met at Ostend and issued a document called the "Ostend Manifesto," the purport of which was that if Spain would not sell Cuba the Americans would take it by force. He used his official influence to promote the designs of the pro-slavery party in Kansas. In the National Democratic Convention of 1856, J. Buchanan and President Pierce were the chief competitors. Pierce received one hundred and twenty-two votes on the first ballot, but failed to obtain the nomination. He retired to private life in March, 1857. In a letter to his friend Jefferson Davis, dated January 6, 1860, he says, "I have never believed that actual disruption of the Union can occur without blood; and if, through the madness of Northern abolitionists, that dire calamity must come, the fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely. It will be within our own borders, in our own streets, between the two classes of citizens to whom I have referred. Those who defy law and scout constitutional obligations will, if we ever reach the arbitrament of arms, find occupation enough at home." He delivered an oration at Concord in the summer of 1863, in which he opposed the coercion of the seceded States, and called Vallandigham "that noble martyr of free speech." Died in 1869.

Pierce, (GEORGE FOSTER,) D.D., an American Methodist divine, born in Greene county, Georgia, in 1811. He was elected president of Emory College, Georgia, in 1848, and in 1854 was appointed a bishop. Died September 3, 1884.

Pierce, (HENRY NILES,) D.D., LL.D., an American bishop, born at Pawtucket, Rhode Island, October 19, 1820, graduated at Brown University in 1842, became a presbyter of the Episcopal Church in 1849, held rectorships in Texas, Alabama, and Illinois, and in 1870 was consecrated Bishop of Arkansas. He wrote "The Agnostic, and other Poems," (1883,) etc. Died in 1899.

He designed at Milan many grand public edifices, among which are the magnificent theatre Della Scala, the Monte di Pietà, the Porta Orientale, and the imposing façade of the Palazzo Belgiojoso. Died in 1808.

Piérola, de, dā pē-ā'ro-lā, (NICOLAS,) a Peruvian soldier, born at Arequipa, January 5, 1839. He became a lawyer and politician, and in 1869 was appointed minister of finance, but was impeached for malfeasance, and, though acquitted, went into exile. He led expeditions against his native country in 1874 and in 1877, but in the latter year was taken prisoner and then banished. After the downfall of Peru in the war with Chili, and the retirement of President Prado in 1879, Piérola assumed the presidency, and continued hostilities in a desultory way until 1881. In that year he abandoned Lima, and in 1882 left the country.

Piéron, pe'ā'rôn', (CHARLES PHILIPPE RENÉ,) a French judge, born at Arras in 1793, was a liberal member of the Chamber of Deputies from 1834 to 1848. Died August 9, 1857.

Pierpont, peer'pŏnt, (JOHN,) an American poet and Unitarian divine, born at Litchfield, Connecticut, in April, 1785. He graduated at Yale College in 1804, and afterwards studied law, which, however, he soon abandoned. He published in 1816 his "Airs of Palestine," which immediately established his reputation. In the same year he studied theology at Harvard, and in 1819 was ordained pastor of the Hollis Street Church, Boston. In 1835 he made the tour of Europe, also visiting Greece and Asia Minor. Mr. Pierpont was a prominent advocate of temperance, anti-slavery, and other reforms. In 1845 he became minister of the Unitarian church of Medford. "Many of his hymns, odes, and other brief poems," says Griswold, "are remarkably spirited and melodious." Died in 1866.

The subject of this article was a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States in 1787. He was Governor of South Carolina from 1789 to 1792, and again from 1796 to 1798. In the latter year he was elected a Senator of the United States by the legislature of South Carolina. He acted with the Republican party, and was an eloquent speaker. He was minister to Spain from 1802 to 1805. Died in 1824.

Pinckney, (CHARLES COTESWORTH,) an American statesman, born at Charleston, South Carolina, in February, 1746, was a son of Chief Justice Pinckney. He graduated at Oxford, England, and studied law. He served as aide-de-camp to Washington at the battles of Brandywine and Germantown, September–October, 1777, and obtained the rank of colonel. In October, 1779, he took part in the battle of Savannah. He was taken prisoner at Charleston in May, 1780, and detained until the end of the war. He was a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, (1787,) advocated the adoption of the same in the Convention of South Carolina, and became a leader of the Federal party. General Washington offered him a place in his cabinet, in 1795, as secretary of war, and afterwards as secretary of state, both of which positions he declined. He was sent as minister to France in 1796, but the French Directory refused to receive him, and ordered him to leave the country in February, 1797. He afterwards returned to Paris with John Marshall and E. Gerry, who had been appointed his colleagues in an embassy. He was appointed a major-general about 1798. At the presidential election of 1800, General Pinckney and John Adams were the Federal candidates; but the Republicans were victorious. He died at Charleston in 1825.

Pin'dar, [Gr. Πίνδαρος; Lat. PIN'DARUS; Fr. PINDARE, pĂN'dăR'; Ger. PINDAR, pin'dâr, and PINDAROS, pin'dâ-ros; It. PINDARO, pēn'dâ-ro,] the greatest lyric poet of Greece, was born near Thebes about 520 B.C. He was a son of Daiphantus, or, according to some writers, of Pagondas. It is stated that he studied poetry and music at Athens under Lasus, and that he was a pupil of the celebrated Corinna, who advised him to choose themes for his muse from mythology. He afterwards composed an ode in which all the mythical legends of Thebes were inwoven, and showed it to Corinna, who reminded him that he "ought to sow with the hand, and not with the whole sack." He became a professional composer of choral odes, and was employed by various states and princes of Greece to write odes for special occasions. Among his patrons were Hiero of Syracuse, Theron of Agrigentum, and Alexander of Macedon. About 473 B.C. he visited the court of Hiero, where he remained four years. His rival Simonides was at Syracuse at the same time. Pindar was a favourite of the Athenians, whose city he praised in an ode, and who presented to him ten thousand drachmæ. He appears to have taken no part in the Persian war and other great events of his time. The only poems of Pindar which have come down to us entire are the "Epinicia," or triumphal odes composed in honour of victors at the public games. Fragments of his dithyrambs, pæans, encomia, and dirges are extant. Horace attributes to Pindar unrivalled skill in several forms of verse. The best translations of Pindar into English verse are those of H. F. Cary and Abraham Moore. Pindar excelled in energy, picturesque effect, and sublimity. He had a son Daiphantus, and two daughters. His death is variously dated at 439 or 442 B.C.

Pitho. See PITHON.

Pī'thon or Pī'tho, [Πίθων,] a Macedonian officer, who had a high command under Alexander in India. He was appointed satrap of Babylon by Antigonus in 316 B.C., and was killed fighting for Demetrius at Gaza, in 312 B.C.

Pithon, [Πίθων,] an officer of Alexander the Great, whose person he attended as a guard. He was the leader of the mutineers who killed Perdiccas in 321 B.C., after which he was joint regent with Arrhidæus for a short time. He was second in command in the army of Antigonus, to whom he rendered important services in the war against Eumenes. He was put to death, by order of Antigonus, in 316 B.C.

Pithou, pe'too', (FRANÇOIS,) a learned French jurist, born at Troyes in 1543, was a brother of Pierre, noticed below. He wrote "Traité de la Grandeur, des Droits, Pré-éminences des Rois et du Royaume de France," (1587.) Died in 1621.

Pithou, (PIERRE,) an eminent French jurist and scholar, was born at Troyes in 1539. He was educated as a Protestant, but became a Roman Catholic in 1573, after a narrow escape from the massacre of 1572. He supported the cause of Henry IV., and was one of the authors of the "Satire Ménippée," which had an important influence in the political affairs of the time. Among his works are "The Liberties of the Gallican Church," (1594,) and "Body of Canon Law," ("Corpus Juris canonici," 1687.) Died in 1596.

Pitiscus, pe-tis'kŭs, (BARTHOLOMÄUS,) a German geometer, born near Grünberg in 1561; died at Heidelberg in 1613.

Pitiscus, pe-tis'kus, (SAMUEL,) a Dutch philologist, born at Zutphen in 1637. He published a "Lexicon Latino-Belgicum," (1704,) a "Lexicon of Roman Antiquities," (1713,) and good editions of Quintus Curtius, Suetonius, and Aurelius Victor. Died in 1727.

Pit'kin, (TIMOTHY,) an American lawyer and historical writer, born at Farmington, Connecticut, in 1765, published a "Political and Civil History of the United States, from 1763 to the Close of Washington's Administration," (1828.) Died in 1847.

See the "North American Review" for January, 1830.

Pitman, (BENN,) an author, a brother of Isaac Pitman, was born at Trowbridge, in England, June 24, 1822. He learned the business of an architect, taught and lectured on his brother's system of phonography in England, 1843–53, came in 1853 to the United States, and became the compiler and publisher of various textbooks of phonography at Cincinnati. He was a government reporter of state trials, 1862–65, and in 1873 became an instructor in the School of Design connected with the University of Cincinnati.

Pitman, (Sir ISAAC,) an English stenographer, born at Trowbridge, Wilts, January 4, 1813. He published "Stenographic Sound Hand," (1837,) "Phonography," (1840,) and "Phonographic Reporter's Companion," (1853.) He is the inventor of the admirable system of modern phonographic short-hand writing, as well as of one of the best systems of phonotypy. Died Jan. 22, 1897.

Pitoni, pe-to'nee, (GIUSEPPE OTTAVIO,) an Italian composer of sacred music, born at Rieti in 1657; died at Rome in 1743.

Pitot, pe'to', (HENRI,) a French geometer, born at Aramon in 1695. He contributed several memoirs to the Academy of Sciences, and published a good work on naval tactics, entitled "Théorie de la Manœuvre des Vaisseaux," (1731.) Died in 1771.

Pitra, pē'trȧ', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a learned French cardinal, born at Champforgeuil, August 31, 1812. He became a Benedictine, and was appointed librarian of the Vatican in 1862, and a cardinal in 1863. In 1879 he was promoted to be a cardinal-bishop, was consecrated Bishop of Frascati, and was given the offices of prefect of the state of the regular clergy, and head of the congregation for the examination of bishops, both in theology and in the canons. Among his works are an excellent "History of Saint Léger," (1846,) a "Life of R. P. Liebermann," (1859,) the magnificent "Spicilegium Solesmense," ("Gleanings from the Abbey of Solesme," 5 vols., 1852–60,) "Juris Ecclesiastici Græcorum Historia et Monumenta," (1864,) "Triodion Katanacticon," (1879, a continuation of the previous work,) and "Hymnography of the Greek Church," (1867.) In 1884 he became Bishop of Porto. Died in 1889.

Pit'rĭ, [a Sanscrit word signifying "father,"] a title applied in the Hindoo mythology to the deified progenitors of mankind, supposed to inhabit the orbit of the moon.

Pits, [Lat. PIT'SEUS,] (JOHN,) an English biographer, born at Alton in 1560, was a Roman Catholic. He became canon of Verdun, in Lorraine, and dean of Liverdun. He wrote "The Lives of the Kings, Bishops, and Writers of England," (4 vols.) The last volume was published in 1619. Died in 1616.

Pitt, (CHRISTOPHER,) an English poet, born at Blandford in 1699. He became rector of Pimpern, in Dorsetshire, and published a volume of poems in 1727. He produced a translation of Virgil's "Æneid," (1740,) which was received with favour. Died in 1748.

Pitt, (THOMAS,) a grandfather of the Earl of Chatham, was born at Blandford in 1653. He was for some years Governor of Madras. He purchased in India for £24,000 a large diamond, (called the Pitt diamond,) which he sold to the Regent of France for £135,000. Died in 1726.

Pitt, (WILLIAM,) an English poet, remembered only as the author of a popular song entitled "The Sailor's Consolation," which is often attributed to Dibdin. Pitt was master attendant at Jamaica dock-yard, and afterwards at Malta, where he died in 1840.

Pitt, (WILLIAM,) Earl of Chatham, an illustrious English statesman and orator, was born November 15, 1708. He was the second son of Robert Pitt, of Boconnoc, in Cornwall, and a grandson of Thomas Pitt, Governor of Madras, who brought from India the Pitt diamond, which is now esteemed the most precious of the crown-jewels of France. His mother was Harriet Villiers. He was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Oxford, which he entered at the age of seventeen. The torments of the gout, to which he was subject nearly all his life, induced him to leave college without taking a degree, and to travel in France and Italy for his health. On his return home he accepted a cornet's commission in the army, and in 1735 was chosen a member of Parliament for Old Sarum. He began his political life as an opponent of the Walpole ministry, and addressed the House for the first time in April, 1736, on the subject of the marriage of the Prince of Wales. Soon after this date he was appointed a groom of the bed-chamber to that prince, and he continued to declaim against Walpole with increasing power. His figure was remarkably graceful and commanding, and his manner highly imposing. "His play of countenance," says Macaulay, "was wonderful: he frequently disconcerted a hostile orator by a single glance of indignation or scorn. Every tone, from the impassioned cry to the thrilling aside, was perfectly at his command. . . . Yet he was not a great debater. His merit was almost entirely rhetorical. He did not succeed either in exposition or refutation; but his speeches abounded with lively illustrations, happy allusions, passionate appeals. His invective and sarcasm were tremendous."

Having been excluded from the new cabinet which was formed on the resignation of Walpole, in 1742, he continued to act with the opposition, and fiercely denounced Carteret for the favour shown to the German dominions of George II. The offence which he thus gave to the king retarded his own promotion when, in 1744, the Pelhams came into power. By tendering their resignations in the critical period of the Jacobite rebellion, the ministers at last prevailed over the king, and Pitt was appointed paymaster of the forces in 1746. The rare disinterestedness which he showed in this lucrative office convinced the public that he was proof against all sordid temptations. He married Hester Grenville, a sister of the Earl of Temple and of George Grenville, in 1754. In this year the premier, Henry Pelham, died, and was succeeded by his brother, the Duke of Newcastle. Pitt, who was perhaps offended because his rival Henry Fox was chosen secretary of state, became the leader of the opposition in November, 1755, soon after which date war broke out between England and France. Newcastle having been forced to resign, Pitt was premier about five months, ending in April, 1757. The king, who disliked Pitt and his colleague Temple, dismissed them, but found great difficulty in forming a new ministry, as Pitt was the most popular statesman in England. After the nation had remained eleven weeks without a ministry, a coalition was formed between Pitt and Newcastle, the former of whom became secretary of state, with the supreme direction of the war and of foreign affairs. He infused new energy and ardour into every branch of the service, and his fame was raised to the highest point by a succession of victories in Canada, India, and Europe. About 1760 he was almost idolized by the people, who called him "the Great Commoner" and regarded him as the foremost Englishman of his time.

On the accession of George III., Pitt was supplanted by Lord Bute, the royal favourite, the success of whose intrigues was promoted by dissensions and jealousies among the ministers, some of whom were offended by the imperious demeanour of the premier. Pitt resigned in October, 1761, and received an annual pension of £3000 for three lives, (i.e. his own, his wife's, and his eldest son's.) In 1765 the king requested Pitt to resume the direction of affairs; but the latter declined the offer because his friend the Earl of Temple refused to take office with him. During the next session of Parliament he condemned the Stamp Act in an eloquent speech, and argued that England had no right to tax the colonies. The renewed overtures and insidious smiles of the court prevailed on him, in 1766, to form a new administration, in which he took the office of privy seal. At the same time he sacrificed his popularity by accepting a peerage, with the title of Earl of Chatham. This was the cabinet that Burke described as a "piece of joinery so whimsically dovetailed; a tesselated pavement without cement," etc. His mental and physical maladies soon became so aggravated that he ceased to take any part in the government, and he resigned in October, 1768. With improved health, he returned to public life about 1771, and spoke often against the ministers. In 1775 he made a brilliant speech on the American war. Alluding to the Boston Port bill, etc., he exclaimed, "You must repeal these acts, and you WILL repeal them. I pledge myself for it that you will repeal them. I stake my reputation on it. I will consent to be taken for an idiot if they are not finally repealed." In 1777 he made a memorable speech against employing Indians to fight in the United States. As he rose to speak in the House of Lords, in 1778, he was seized with an apoplectic fit. He lingered a few weeks, and died in May, 1778, leaving three sons, the second of whom was the celebrated statesman William Pitt the Younger.

"His eloquence," says Brougham, "was of the very highest order: vehement, fiery, close to the subject, concise, sometimes eminently, even boldly, figurative: it was original and surprising, yet quite natural. The fine passages or felicitous hits in which all popular assemblies take boundless delight . . . form the grand charm of Lord Chatham's oratory. . . . A noble statement of enlarged views, a generous avowal of dignified sentiments, a manly and somewhat severe contempt for all petty and mean views, always pervaded his whole discourse; and, more than any orator since Demosthenes, he was distinguished by the grandeur of feeling with which he regarded, and the amplitude of survey which he cast upon, the subject-matters of debate. He is the person to whom every one would at once point if desired to name the most successful statesman and most brilliant orator that this country ever produced. Some fragments of his speeches have been handed down to us; but these bear so very small a proportion to the prodigious fame which his eloquence has left behind it, that far more is manifestly lost than has reached us." Several volumes, entitled "Chatham Papers: Correspondence from the Original MSS.," were published in 1838–40, 4 vols.

Pitt, (The Right Honourable WILLIAM,) a celebrated statesman and debater, was the second son of the preceding, and was born at Hayes, in Kent, in May, 1759. At the age of seven, when he heard that his father was raised to the peerage, he said, "I am glad that I am not the eldest son. I want to speak in the House of Commons, like papa." He received the rudiments of education at home, under the diligent supervision of his father, and acquired great proficiency in Latin, Greek, and mathematics, before he entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1773. Having chosen the profession of the law, he took chambers in Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1780. In 1781 he entered Parliament for Appleby, as an opponent of the ministry, and before the end of the second session assumed his place in the first rank of debaters. His talents and conduct amply justified and responded to the partiality with which the public regarded the son of the Great Commoner. He acquired a new claim to public favour by a motion (in May, 1782) for a reform in the representation, which was rejected by a small majority. His principles at that time were the same with those of the Whigs. On the formation of the ministry of Lord Shelburne, in July, 1782, Mr. Pitt was appointed chancellor of the exchequer. By a coalition between Lord North and Mr. Fox, this ministry was forced to resign in March, 1783, and Pitt became the leader of the opposition in the House. The king, after procuring the defeat of Fox's India bill, dismissed Fox and Lord North, whose coalition was very unpopular, and appointed Pitt first lord of the treasury (prime minister) in December, 1783. He had to contend against a large majority in the House, led by Fox, Burke, North, and Sheridan, who triumphed in sixteen divisions. This important contest lasted until March, 1784, when Parliament was dissolved. His appeal to the people resulted in a great triumph of the minister, who, thus sustained by the favour of the court and by that of the nation, became at the age of twenty-five the most powerful subject of Europe.

The first eight years of his administration were peaceful and prosperous. A new constitution for the East India Company was framed in 1784, and a new sinking-fund established in 1786. He changed his course on the question of parliamentary reform, which he opposed at several periods after 1792. He supported with his eloquence and his vote the motions of Wilberforce for the abolition of the slave-trade. "All authorities agree," says Brougham, "in placing his speech on the slave-trade, in 1791, before any other effort of his genius." Yet he permitted, for many years, every one of his colleagues to vote against the abolition, and thus furnished the ground of the gravest charge to which his memory is exposed. His ascendency was confirmed by the excesses of the French Revolution, and by the division which that subject produced in the Whig party; but the tide of his success began to ebb when he involved England in a war with the French republic in 1793,—a war which, according to Alison, added three hundred millions to the national debt. (See BONAPARTE, and GEORGE III.) "His conduct of the war," says Brougham, "betrayed no extent of views, no commanding notions of policy. To form one coalition after another in Germany, and subsidize them with millions of free gift, or aid with profuse loans, until all the powers in our pay were defeated in succession, and most of them either destroyed or converted into allies of the enemy,—such were all the resources of his diplomatic policy." In 1800 an act for the union of Ireland with Great Britain was passed in the Parliament of the latter. He resigned office in March, 1801, and was succeeded by Addington. The ostensible cause of his resignation was that the king objected to the measures which Pitt proposed for the relief of the Roman Catholics. Alison intimates that he retired to make way for a pacific administration.

A combination of Whigs and Tories having been formed against Addington, he resigned, and Pitt was again appointed prime minister, in May, 1804. The new ministry was formed exclusively of Tories. The premature death of Pitt appears to have been hastened by the vexation which he suffered from the failure of the new coalition, and the victories of Bonaparte at Ulm and Austerlitz. He died on the 23d of January, 1806, having never been married.

"Unequalled in the ability with which he overcame the jealousies and awakened the activity of cabinets," says Alison, "he was by no means equally felicitous in the warlike measures which he recommended for their adoption. Napoleon has observed that he had no turn for military combinations; and a retrospect of the campaigns which he had a share in directing, must confirm the justice of the opinion. By not engaging England as a principal in the contest, and trusting for land operations to the continental armies put in motion by British subsidies, he prolonged the war for an indefinite period." ("History of Europe.") He is admitted by all parties to have been a consummate debater, and almost unequalled as a master of sarcasm. His declamation was copious, polished, and impressive. He poured forth a long succession of round and stately periods, with a full and sonorous voice and with an unbending dignity of manner. "Yet, with all this excellence," says Brougham, "the last effect of the highest eloquence was for the most part wanting: we seldom forgot the speaker, or lost the artist in the work." His private character is described as amiable. Pride appears to have been his principal fault.

Pit'ta-cus, [Πιττακός,] a celebrated Greek statesman, philosopher, and poet, called one of the Seven Wise Men of Greece, was born at Mitylene, in Lesbos, about 650 B.C. He distinguished himself in a battle against the Athenians (whose leader, Phrynon, he killed) in 606 B.C. About 590 he was chosen supreme ruler by the popular party, which had expelled the aristocratic party. The poet Alcæus belonged to the latter, and was exiled in the time of Pittacus. Having governed the state wisely for ten years, he resigned his office in 580 B.C. He was famous as an elegiac poet; but only a few of his lines are extant. Died in 569 B.C.

Pit'theŭs, [Gr. Πιτθεύς; Fr. PITTHÉE, pe'tā',] a son of Pelops and Hippodami'a, was a king of Trœzene, the father of Æthra, and grandfather of Theseus. Pausanias ascribes to him a work on the art of speaking.

Pit'tis, (THOMAS,) an English clergyman, born in the Isle of Wight, entered Trinity College, Oxford, about 1652. Died in 1687.

Pittoni, pēt-to'nee, (BATTISTA,) an Italian painter and engraver, born at Vicenza about 1520; died after 1585.

Pittoni, (GIOVANNI BATTISTA,) an Italian painter, born at Venice in 1687. Among his best works is "The Miracle of the Loaves." Died in 1767.

Pittorio, pēt-to're-o, or Pittori, pēt-to'ree, [Lat. PICTO'RIUS,] (LODOVICO BIGI,) a Latin poet, born at Ferrara in 1454. He wrote "Candida," (1491,) "Moral Epigrams," ("Epigrammata moralia," 1516,) and other poems. Died about 1524.

Pitts, (WILLIAM,) an English sculptor, called "the British Cellini," was born in London in 1790. He learned the trade of gold-chaser. He displayed a fine fancy for design, and remarkable executive skill. Among his works are "The Creation of Eve," (1824,) "The Shield of Æneas," (1828,) "The Shield of Hercules," (1834,) and the "Apotheoses of Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton," in bas-relief. He committed suicide in 1840.

Pi'us [It. PIO, pee'o; Fr. PIE, pee] I., Pope or Bishop of Rome, was born at Aquileia. He succeeded Hyginus in 142 A.D., and died in 157. His successor was Anicetus.

Pius (or Pio) II., POPE, (ÆNE'AS SYL'VIUS Piccolomini—pēk-ko-lom'e-nee,) was born at Corsignano, Tuscany, in 1405. He was liberally educated, and was familiar with the ancient classics. In 1535 he produced a history of the Council of Bâle. He was a partisan of this council in its contest against Pope Eugenius IV., and became the secretary of Felix V., who was elected pope in place of Eugenius, whom the council deposed. About 1442 he entered the service of the emperor Frederick III., of whom he wrote a history, "Historia Rerum Friderici III." In the pontificate of Nicholas V., Æneas Sylvius was sent as nuncio to Germany. He distinguished himself as a negotiator and orator on various occasions. He became a cardinal in 1456, and was elected pope in 1458, in place of Calixtus III. In 1459 he procured the meeting of a European congress on the subject of a crusade against the Turks; but the jealousies and dissensions among the Christian powers rendered his efforts abortive. He issued a bull in which he retracted and condemned what he had formerly written in favour of the supremacy of councils. He died in August, 1464, and was succeeded by Paul II. Pius II. was an eminent historian and scholar. Among his numerous works are "Epistolæ," (1473,) and a "History of Bohemia," (1475,) which are highly prized.

Pius III., POPE, (FRANCESCO Todeschini Piccolomini—to-dēs-kee'nee pēk-ko-lom'e-nee,) born at Sienna in 1439, was a nephew of Pius II. He succeeded Alexander VI. in September, 1503, and died in October of the same year. His successor was Julius II.

Pius IV., POPE, (GIOVANNI ANGELO de' Medici—dā mĕd'e-chee,) was born at Milan in 1499, and was an uncle of the eminent Carlo Borromeo. He was elected pope, in place of Paul IV., about the end of 1559. He convoked the Council of Trent which reassembled in 1561 and finished its labours in 1563. The decrees of this council in relation to discipline, etc. were rejected by the French. He is represented by some historians as an able but rather unscrupulous pontiff. He died in December, 1565, and was succeeded by Pius V.

See RANKE, "History of the Popes."

Pius V., POPE, (MICHELE Ghislieri—gēs-le-ā'ree,) was born at or near Alessandria in 1504. He became a cardinal in 1557, and Inquisitor-General of Christendom. In 1566 he was elected pope. He was a rigorist in discipline, and a violent persecutor of dissenters. Palearius, Zanetti, and other learned men were put to death by his inquisitors. He published in 1568 the bull "In Cœna Domini," which asserts the extreme ultramontane doctrines in relation to the papal supremacy. The publication of this bull was forbidden by the Kings of France and Spain and the Emperor of Germany. Pius V. was one of the allies whose fleet gained the victory of Lepanto over the Turks, in 1571. He died in 1572, and was succeeded by Gregory XIII.

Pius VI., POPE, (Cardinal ANGELO Braschi—brās-kee,) was born at Cesena in 1717. He succeeded Clement XIV. in February, 1775. He drained the Pontine marshes, and enriched the Museum of the Vatican. In 1782 he went in person to Vienna to treat with the emperor Joseph, who had suppressed convents and meddled with spiritual affairs in a manner which displeased the pope. He failed in his effort to change the purpose of the emperor. The French Revolution involved him in a still greater trouble. He entered into alliance with Austria and other powers against the French republic. After his states had been invaded by Bonaparte, he sued for peace, which he obtained by the treaty of Tolentino, in 1797. To avenge the death of General Duphot, (who was killed by a Roman mob,) the French army entered Rome in February, 1798, and deposed the pope, who was conveyed to Valence, in France, where he died in August, 1799.

See FERRARI, "Vita Pii VI.," 1802; TAVANTI, "Fasti del Papa Pio VI.," 3 vols., 1804; ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire de Pie VI," 1847; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Pius VII., POPE, (GREGORIO BARNABA LUIGI Chiaramonti—ke-â-râ-mon'tee,) was born at Cesena in August, 1742. He became a cardinal, and Bishop of Imola, in 1785. After the French had become masters of Imola, he exhorted his people to submit to the new régime. He was elected pope by a conclave of cardinals assembled at Venice in March, 1800, and appointed Cardinal Consalvi secretary of state. The first important event of his reign was a treaty with Bonaparte, by which the Roman Catholic religion was re-established in France. This treaty, called the Concordat, was signed on the 15th of July, 1801. In compliance with the request of Bonaparte, Pius went to Paris and crowned or anointed him as emperor in December, 1804. He refused to comply with the will of Napoleon when the latter required him to banish the English, Russians, and Swedes from the Papal States, (1806,) and resisted him in other designs. The French army occupied Rome in February, 1808, but permitted the pope to retain some temporal power. In May, 1809, Napoleon issued a decree that the Papal States were united to the French empire. The pope, having resorted to a bull of excommunication against his adversaries, was seized and abducted from Rome in July, 1809. He was detained at Savona, near Genoa, until 1812, and was then removed to Fontainebleau. In his captivity the pope firmly resisted the will of the emperor, who probably wished him to transfer his court from Rome to Avignon. Pius refused to give canonical institution to the bishops appointed by Napoleon. In January, 1813, he was persuaded to sign a new concordat and to make concessions, which, however, by the advice of his cardinals, he soon retracted. In January, 1814, he received an order or permission to return to Rome, which he entered in May. He afterwards made some laudable reforms. He died in August, 1823, and was succeeded by Leo XII. Pius VII. left a fair reputation for moderation and other virtues.

Pius VIII., POPE, (Cardinal FRANCESCO Castiglioni—kâs-têl-yo'nee,) was born at Cingoli in 1761. He succeeded Leo XII. in March, 1829, and issued an encyclical letter in which he denounced religious toleration, the freedom of the press, and civil marriage, as impious. He died in November, 1830. His successor was Gregory XVI.

Pius IX., [Ital. PIO NONO, pee'o no'no,] POPE, (GIOVANNI MARIA Mastai Ferretti—mâs'tî fêr-ret'tee,) was born, of a noble family, at Sinigaglia, near Ancona, on the 13th of May, 1792. He visited South America in 1823 on a religious mission, and was made Archbishop of Spoleto in 1827. In 1840 he obtained the dignity of cardinal. He was elected by acclamation the successor of Pope Gregory XVI. in June, 1846. He granted an amnesty to political transgressors, and acquired great popularity by various measures of reform which he commenced soon after his election. His first secretary of state, Cardinal Gizzi, was a friend of progress and a liberal policy. The expenses of the papal court were reduced, the censorship of the press was modified, and the Jews were relieved from some oppressive regulations. His reforms were partly frustrated by the ill will of many of his functionaries, who opposed innovation. His popularity began to decline before the end of 1847. Excited and elated by the French revolution, the Italian liberals required greater concessions than the pope was willing to grant. After several violent demonstrations of the populace, Pius IX. escaped from Rome in disguise in November, 1848, and retired to Gaëta. A republic was organized at Rome in February, 1849, but was subverted by a French army which took the city in July of that year and restored the pope. Among the later events of his pontificate was the formal definition and recognition of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception as a part of the Roman Catholic creed, (1854.) During the war which Austria waged against the French and Sardinians in 1859, the people of the Romagna and the legations revolted against the pope, and the Papal States were annexed to the kingdom of Victor Emmanuel. In January, 1860, the pope issued an anathema, or bull, against those who abetted the invasion of his dominions. This was probably aimed at Napoleon III., who suppressed the journal in which it was published. Rome was declared the capital of the new kingdom of Italy in 1860, after which the question of the pope's temporal power remained for some time one of the great problems of European diplomacy. The recognition of the kingdom of Italy by the French court (1861) was accompanied by the reservation that "French troops shall continue to occupy Rome so long as the interests which caused their presence shall not be protected by sufficient guarantees." The pope was the only power that recognized the "Confederate States of North America." The results of the war between the Emperor of Austria and the allied Kings of Prussia and Italy in 1866 were unfavourable to papal domination. About the 10th of December, 1866, the French army departed from Rome, and Italy was relieved from the presence of foreign soldiery, for the first time probably in a thousand years. He convoked by an encyclical letter an œcumenical council which met at Rome in December, 1869, to assert or define the dogma of the pope's infallibility, which, after a long deliberation, was finally established in July, 1870. The Italian army took Rome on the 20th of September, without serious resistance, and the temporal power of the pope was then abolished, but Pius remained in Rome until his death, February 7, 1878.

Pix, (MARY,) originally GRIFFITH, an English dramatist, born in Oxfordshire about 1665; died about 1720.

Pix'is, (JOHANN PETER,) a German pianist and composer, born in 1788 at Mannheim, where his father, Friedrich Wilhelm, was a musician of some local repute. The son's chief fame was won as a teacher of the piano, both in Paris and in Baden-Baden, at which latter place he died December 21, 1874.

Pix'ley, (ANNIE,) an American actress, born at New York city in 1855. She married Robert Fulford, an actor, in 1871, and appeared with him on the stage in 1876. She became a favourite in the character of M'liss, also in "The Deacon's Daughter." Died in 1893.

Pizarre. See PIZARRO.

Pizarro, pe-zâr'ro, [Sp. pron. pe-thâr'ro; Fr. PIZARRE, pe'zăr',] (FRANCISCO,) the conqueror of Peru, was born at Truxillo, in Spain, about 1475. He was the natural son of Gonzalo Pizarro, who was a colonel in the Spanish army. He was employed as a swineherd in his youth, and never learned to read or write. The date of his emigration to the New World has not been preserved; but in 1510 he took part in the expedition of Ojeda from Hispaniola to Terra Firma. He afterwards served under Balboa, with whom he performed an arduous march across the mountains from Darien to the Pacific Ocean. In 1522 Pizarro, who had risen to the rank of captain, associated himself, at Panamá, with Almagro and a rich priest named De Luque, in an enterprise to explore and conquer the region which lies south of the Isthmus of Darien. Having enlisted in his service about one hundred desperadoes, he sailed from Panamá with one small vessel in November, 1524. His first expedition was unsuccessful and attended with great hardships. He renewed the enterprise in 1526, but made slow progress and lost many men. He landed at the city of Tumbez without opposition, and was stimulated to pursue his project by the sight of the gold trinkets and utensils which the natives displayed in great profusion. Having explored the coast as far as Truxillo, about 9° south latitude, he found it inexpedient to proceed with his reduced force, and returned to Panamá in 1528. With the consent of Almagro and De Luque, Pizarro went to Spain to solicit aid from the king. In this mission he was successful. He procured for himself an appointment as governor and captain-general of the region which he might conquer for a distance of two hundred leagues south of Santiago; but he neglected to obtain any high office for Almagro, who was disgusted with this perfidious conduct. In January, 1531, Pizarro sailed from Panamá with one hundred and eighty men and about thirty horses, leaving Almagro behind to muster reinforcements. A civil war which raged in Peru between Atahualpa and Huascar presented a favourable opportunity for his design. Having marched across the sierra of the Andes to Caxamarca, he met the Inca Atahualpa in November, 1532. The treacherous and audacious Spaniard seized the Inca, who had come to the Spanish camp for a friendly interview. To obtain his liberty, the Inca offered to fill a room twenty-two feet long and sixteen feet wide with golden vessels and utensils, etc. up to a line as high as he could reach. Pizarro assented to this proposal, and obtained about 1,326,000 pesos of gold, the value of which Prescott estimates at over fifteen millions of dollars; but he caused Atahualpa to be put to death by the garote. "The blood-stained annals of the conquest," says Prescott, "afford no such example of cold-hearted and systematic persecution, not of an enemy, but of one whose whole deportment had been that of a friend and benefactor." In November, 1533, Pizarro entered Cuzco, the capital, and the conquest of Peru was virtually effected. Civil war broke out in 1537 between Pizarro and Almagro, who was defeated and executed in 1538. (See ALMAGRO.) To avenge his death, a conspiracy was formed by Almagro the Younger, and Pizarro was assassinated at Lima in June, 1541. "The name of Pizarro became a by-word of perfidy," says Prescott, who, however, praises his invincible constancy.

Pizarro, (GONZALO,) a brother of the preceding, was born about 1506. He went to the New World in 1530, and served under Francisco Pizarro in Peru. According to Prescott, he was inferior in talent to his brother, but quite as unscrupulous. He was appointed governor of Quito in 1540, and discovered the river Napo. In 1544 he became the leader of malcontents who revolted against the viceroy Nuñez. About the end of 1545 the latter was defeated and killed in battle by Pizarro, who remained master of Peru. He in turn was defeated near Cuzco by the viceroy Gasca in April, 1548, and beheaded in the same month.

See PRESCOTT, "History of the Conquest of Peru;" HERRERA, "Novus Orbis."

Pizarro, (HERNANDO,) was a half-brother of the preceding. He left Spain in 1530, and took a prominent part in the conquest of Peru. With a force of about seven hundred men he defeated Almagro at Las Salinas in April, 1538. He returned to Spain in 1539, and was imprisoned twenty years, probably for the execution of Almagro. Died about 1566.

Pizarro, (JUAN,) a brother of the preceding, was born at Truxillo about 1505. He assisted in the conquest of Peru, and became governor of Cuzco. He was killed in battle at Cuzco in 1535.

Pizarro, (PEDRO,) a Spanish historian and soldier of the sixteenth century, born at Toledo, was a relative of the celebrated commander Francisco Pizarro. He wrote a work entitled "Account of the Discovery and Conquest of the Kingdoms of Peru," ("Relaciones del Descubrimiento y Conquista de los Reynos del Peru,") published about 1847.

See PRESCOTT, "History of the Conquest of Peru," vol. ii. book iii.

Platner, (ERNST ZACHARIAS,) a writer, a son of the preceding, was born at Leipsic in 1773. He published a "Description of Rome," (1830–43.) Died in 1855.

Platner, (JOHANN ZACHARIAS,) a surgeon, born at Chemnitz in 1694, was the father of Ernst, noticed above. He taught at Leipsic, and was a skilful oculist. He wrote, in elegant Latin, "Surgical Institutes," ("Institutiones Chirurgiæ rationales," 1745,) and other works. Died in 1747.

Plā'to,* [Gr. Πλάτων; Lat. PLA'TO; Fr. PLATON, plȧ'tôN'; Ger. the same as the Latin; It. PLATONE, plȧ-to'nȧ; Sp. PLATON, plȧ-tôn'; Port. PLATÃO, plȧ-tŏwN'; Arab. and Persian, AFLÂTOON, ą-flȧ'tōōn',] one of the most illustrious philosophers of all time, was born about 429 B.C. He belonged to one of the highest families of Athens, being descended on the side of his father, Aris'to, (or Aris'ton,) from Codrus, and on that of his mother, Pericti'one, he was related to the celebrated lawgiver Solon. As to the place of his birth there is some dispute. Some writers say that he was born at Athens; others, in the island of Ægina. His original name was Aris'tocles, after his grandfather: he was surnamed PLATO, (from πλατύς, "broad,") on account of the breadth of his forehead, or, as some say, of his shoulders. Very little is certainly known of the history of his life, and, as is usual in such cases, the absence of positive information is liberally supplied by what is legendary or fabulous. It is related that while an infant, as he was one day sleeping in a bower on Mount Hymettus, a number of bees dropping honey settled upon his lips, thus foreshadowing the extraordinary sweetness of his eloquence. According to another story, his future greatness was foreshown by a dream of Socrates, who saw in his sleep a young swan coming from the grove of Academus; after nestling in his bosom, it soared aloft, singing sweetly as it rose. The next morning, just as Socrates had finished relating his dream, Aristo presented himself, leading by the hand young Plato, whom he wished to place under the instruction of that distinguished sage.

Plato was a remarkable example of that universal culture which characterized the best period of ancient Greece. He appears to have neglected no branch of science or art which was considered to form any part of a liberal education. He studied music, rhetoric, and painting, and, after the manner of his countrymen, paid great attention to gymnastics, in which he was so expert, we are told, that he contended at the Isthmian and Pythian games. In early life he is said to have turned his attention to poetry, and to have written an epic poem, which, however, on comparing it with the "Iliad," he burned in despair. He also composed some lyrics and several tragedies. But "having once," as Ælian expresses it, "been captivated by the siren of Socrates," he gave himself up wholly to the study of philosophy. He was in his twentieth year, as it appears, when he began to attend the school of Socrates, where he continued until his master's death, (399 B.C.) After this event, in order to escape the persecutions which threatened them, he, with several other Socratic disciples, withdrew to Megara, where they were received by the philosopher Euclid, who had also been a pupil of Socrates. Plato is said subsequently to have travelled extensively, visiting Egypt, Sicily, and Magna Græcia, where he became acquainted with the doctrines of Pythagoras. Some writers speak of his having journeyed into the interior of Asia for the purpose of enriching his mind with the wisdom of the Persians, Babylonians, and other nations of the East; but of this there is not a particle of trustworthy evidence. While in Sicily he became acquainted with Dion, (or Dio,) who introduced him to Dionysius the Elder. But the philosopher, as might well be supposed, was not likely to find much favour in the eyes of an unscrupulous and reckless tyrant. They soon quarrelled, and on one occasion Dionysius, it is said, was so deeply offended with the freedom of some of Plato's remarks, that, had not Dion interposed, he would have punished him with death. Although the tyrant was prevailed on to spare his life, he caused him to be sold as a slave. He was, however, ransomed and set at liberty,—some say by Dion, others, by Anniceris of Cyrene. Having returned to Athens, he opened a school, called the Academy, (Academia,) in a grove, which had formerly belonged to a citizen named Academus or Hecademus. His school was numerously attended by young men of the most distinguished families of Athens and of all Greece. Even women were numbered, it is said, among his disciples. After having taught in Athens more than twenty years, he again visited Sicily, at the solicitation of Dion, who hoped that Plato's influence might be successful in winning to philosophy the younger Dionysius, and in establishing, through him, a model government in Syracuse. (For a most interesting account of this experiment and its failure, see Grote's "History of Greece," vols. x. and xi.) He afterwards visited Syracuse for the third time, in order to effect a reconciliation between Dionysius and Dion; but in this attempt he was wholly unsuccessful. He returned to Athens, where he continued to write and teach until his death, which occurred 347 B.C., in his eighty-fourth year. According to some writers, however, he died in his eighty-first year. He was, as Cicero informs us, occupied in writing at the very moment of his death. There is perhaps in the history of the human intellect no example of any one having dedicated himself with a more absolute devotion to philosophy (the "love or study of wisdom") than Plato. He was never married; and, from the time when he first became acquainted with Socrates, (about his twentieth year,) every moment of his long life appears to have been spent in the interest of his favourite pursuit.

This entire dedication of all his powers to one grand object has not been without results of the highest importance to mankind. Probably no other philosopher, of whatever age or nation, has contributed so much as Plato towards the moral and intellectual culture of the human race. This pre-eminence is to be ascribed not solely to his transcendent intellect or to the marvellous depth and comprehensiveness of his philosophic views, but also in no small measure to his poetic power, and to that unrivalled grace and beauty of style which led the ancients to say that if Jove should speak Greek he would speak like Plato. Macaulay, alluding to Plato's wonderful power as a writer, speaks of him as "the finest of human intellects, exercising boundless dominion over the finest of human languages." ("Essay on Lord Bacon.") The charms of his style, indeed, by awakening the interest and admiration of all lovers of literature, have doubtless been one of the chief causes of that state of excellent preservation in which his works have come down to us. For, by a singular good fortune, all his philosophical writings, there is reason to believe, have been preserved, not only unmutilated with respect to the different parts, but with the text, comparatively speaking, uncorrupted and unimpaired.

With respect to Plato's character as a man we know scarcely anything except what is revealed in his works. "Despite the disposition of the Greeks for calumny," says Ritter, "there are but few evil rumours against which we have to vindicate the purity of his moral conduct." The same writer not only rejects as unfounded the charges against the purity of Plato's private character, but regards as either wholly unjust or greatly exaggerated the imputation against him of malice or ill feeling towards certain other disciples of Socrates, such as Xenophon, Euclid, Aristippus, and others, whose views on many points differed widely from his own. Plato has been accused by some modern writers of being wanting in patriotism and in a sympathy for humanity. Both of these charges seem to us unjust. The state of political morals in his time was such that he could scarcely hope to effect any good by taking an active part in public affairs. By doing so, there is every reason to believe, he would have only embroiled himself in an endless conflict with men with whom his standard of right would not permit him to co-operate. Besides, his talents do not appear to have fitted him for politics; and he is certainly not to be censured for confining himself to that field of labour for which nature had best qualified him. The charge that he was wanting in a sympathy for human nature appears to have no other foundation than the fact that he had no sympathy with vice and ignorance, two most conspicuous features in the human nature which he saw around him. Yet the great object, and, we may add, the tendency, of nearly all his teachings was to make mankind happier by making them wiser and better.*

With respect to Plato's philosophic system, it is impossible to say with any precision how much of it was properly his own, and how much was derived from his great master. (See SOCRATES.) It is a fine saying of Mr. Emerson, that "Socrates and Plato are the double star which the most powerful instruments will not entirely separate."† The plan and limits of the present work will permit us only to glance at some of the most striking characteristics of Plato's philosophy as we find it unfolded in his writings. His system may be considered from two points of view,—the one having reference to the method, the other to the results, of his philosophic investigations. His method, which appears to be scarcely more than an extension of that of Socrates, was undoubtedly a great improvement on the methods of previous philosophers.

But the admirable lessons of his great teacher, respecting the manner and spirit with which the search after truth should be conducted, would in all probability have been quickly forgotten and lost to the world, had not Plato made them immortal by his writings. Referring the reader to the article on SOCRATES for a brief notice of the Socratic method, we shall here limit ourselves to simply calling attention to some of the most remarkable points in Plato's philosophic creed, without attempting, in our narrow space, to give even a complete outline of his system. He taught that God was the supreme Idea or Essence of the universe, comprising within himself all other beings, and was the Cause of all things, celestial and terrestrial. He alone is good, without envy, willing good to all so far as each is capable of receiving it: God alone is unchangeable. Plato strongly condemned the views, then prevalent, which represented the gods as having human passions and as influenced by selfish human motives. While he taught the existence of one supreme God, the source and upholder of all things, he appears to have recognized, at the same time, a class of inferior deities, or beings with godlike attributes, far superior to man. One of the most remarkable features of Plato's philosophy is his theory of ideas. With him, an idea is not simply an image or conception formed by the human mind: it is rather an eternal thought of the Divine mind. He held that the human soul is not only immortal, but that it has always existed.‡ In its pre-existent state it has had a perception of the eternal ideas (i.e. the perfect forms or patterns of things) as they exist in the mind of God. A dim, shadowy remembrance of those celestial patterns is what sometimes enables us to form a conception of loveliness, virtue, etc. far more perfect, more divine, than anything our mortal eyes have ever beheld. It is thus that the gifted painter is enabled to give us forms of beauty more exquisite than any that can be found in this world. It is thus, also, that on hearing of a generous action we are enabled to form an idea of generosity; for it is obvious that such an action could have no significance to one who had never known the feeling of generosity in his soul: in a perfectly selfish man, if such a one could be found, it would not awaken admiration, but simply contempt. Xenophon tells us, in the second book of his "Anabasis," that Menon the Thessalian considered honesty and truth to be nothing else than stupidity or folly. A Platonist would explain this by saying that all traces of the Divine ideas of truth and justice had, through the love of gain or love of power, become obliterated from his soul. Plato taught that the only way in which men can rise in wisdom and virtue is by striving to restore the lost ideas and to make their minds approximate the mind of God.

Plato appears to have made himself thoroughly acquainted with all the previous philosophic systems which had appeared in Greece. He had not only diligently studied the doctrines of Heraclitus, Pythagoras, and Socrates, but also those of Anaxagoras, Parmenides, and others of less note. "He reduced," says Ritter, "into a beautiful whole the scattered results of the earlier Greek philosophy, reconciling their seeming differences and conflicting tendencies. . . . When, indeed, we compare the barrenness of the earlier philosophers with the fertility of Plato, that love, which he knows so well how to inspire in us, warms almost to veneration, so rich, so varied, and so abundant are his observations, and so profound his knowledge of man and of the world. . . . To such richness of materials Plato united the rarest skill of language and composition to a degree which has never since been equalled."

Respecting Plato's intellectual power as a philosopher, Mr. Emerson grandly observes that "his strength is like the momentum of a falling planet, and his discretion the return of its due and perfect curve." Again he says, "The way to know him [Plato] is to compare him, not with nature, but with other men. How many ages have gone by, and he remains unapproached!" ("Representative Men.")

The philosophic writings of Plato are, with some slight exceptions, in the form of dialogues, in all of which, save one, ("The Laws,") Socrates is one of the chief interlocutors. The different dialogues have been distributed by Schleiermacher into three divisions.

The first division, in which the development of the dialogistic method is the chief object, includes the "Phædrus," "Lysis," "Protagoras," "Laches," "Charmides," "Euthyphro," and "Parmenides," to which are added, by way of appendix or supplement, the "Apology of Socrates," "Critos," "Ion," "Hippias Minor," "Hipparchus," "Minos," and "Alcibiades II." The second division, in which the predominant subject is the explanation of knowledge, including the difference between philosophical and common knowledge, comprises the

* We need scarcely say that we utterly and totally dissent from Macaulay's estimate of Plato's philosophic writings, (see "Essay on Lord Bacon," second part,) which he compares to a magnificent tree, full of beautiful leaves and flowers, but producing no fruit. Writings which have inspired the souls of so many thousands with loftier aspirations and with a more earnest love of virtue, may be truly said to have borne fruit of the most precious kind, compared with which the boasted products of the Baconian philosophy are little better than the apples of the Dead Sea. That Plato's writings have often produced the results which we have ascribed to them will scarcely be denied, we think, by any one familiar with those writings or with the history of antiquity. To cite one example out of many, Cato the Younger, confessedly one of the noblest and most virtuous of all the Romans, when surrounded with misfortunes on every hand, and amid the ruins of his country, sought and found consolation and hope in the sublime teachings of Plato's "Phædo."

† See "Representative Men," article "Plato," the whole of which is well worthy of perusal by those who would have a vivid conception of Plato's power as a philosopher. This essay, it seems to us, is one of Mr. Emerson's happiest efforts; and, if he sometimes exaggerates the greatness and worth of his hero, the fault is more than atoned for by a thorough and vivid appreciation of his subject,—perhaps the most important, as it is the rarest, qualification of a good critic.

‡ He appears to have believed not that the soul has always existed in its present form or condition, or anything like it, but that God is the source of all things, and as His thoughts and purposes are eternal, the soul may therefore be said to have always had an existence in that infinite Being of whom it is an emanation.

"Gorgias," "Theætetus," "Meno," "Euthydemus," "Cratylus," "Sophistes," "Politicus," ("Statesman,") "Symposium," ("Banquet,") "Phædo," (or "Phædon,") and "Philebus," with an appendix containing the "Theages," "Erastæ," "Alcibiades I.," "Menexenus," "Hippias Major," and "Clitophon." The third division consists of such as contain an objective scientific exposition,—in other words, combine practical science with speculative philosophy: these are the "Republic," "Timæus," and "Critias," to which may be added "The Laws." The first edition of Plato's entire works was that published in Venice by Aldus in 1513; the best are perhaps—first, that of Ast, published at Leipsic, in 9 vols. 8vo, 1819–27, and, second, that of G. Stallbaum, in 8 vols. 8vo, Leipsic, 1821–25, (and the same text in 8 vols. 12mo, 1826.) Jowett's "Dialogues of Plato," in 5 vols., is the best English translation of Plato.

Plato, [Gr. Πλάτων,] an eminent Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, flourished about 428–390 B.C., and was contemporary with Aristophanes. He attacked Cleon and other demagogues in his plays, which displayed keen wit, vigour, and purity of style. Many fragments of them have come down to us. According to some critics, he was a writer of the middle comedy.

Platof, Platov, or Platow, plä'tof, Hetman of the Cossacks, was born on the Don about 1760. He served as general in the Russian army which marched to the aid of Prussia in 1806. He harassed the retreating French army in 1812, and entered Paris with a troop of Cossacks in 1814. Died in 1818.

Platon, plä'ton, (LEFSHIN or LEFFSCHIN,) an eminent Russian prelate, born near Moscow in 1737. He distinguished himself as an eloquent pulpit orator, and became court preacher to Catherine II. He was appointed Archbishop of Moscow in 1775, and Metropolitan of the Russian Church in 1787. He published many sermons and theological works, which are highly commended. Died in November, 1812.

Platone. See PLATO.

Platt, (THOMAS COLLIER,) an American politician, was born at Owego, New York, in 1833. He was elected to Congress in 1873, and in 1881 to the Senate, but resigned, with his colleague Conkling, the same year, through opposition to Garfield's policy of civil-service reform. In 1880 he became president of the United States Express Company. He was engaged in other business, but devoted his time largely to politics, and for years was the autocrat of the Republican party in New York. He was re-elected to the Senate in 1896.

Platte-Montagne, plät'mŏn'tän', (MATTHEW VAN PLATHEN-BERCH or PLATTENBERG,) a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about 1606. He removed to Paris, where he painted portraits and engraved landscapes. Died in 1660. His son NICOLAS (1631–1705) was also a painter and engraver.

Plau'tus, [Fr. PLAUTE, plōt; It. PLAUTO, plŏw'to,] (TITUS MACCIUS,) the most celebrated of the Roman comic poets, was a native of Sarsina, in Umbria. It is supposed that he was born about 254, or, as some say, in 224 B.C. In his youth he served a baker by grinding corn with a hand-mill. Little is known of his history. According to Cicero, he died in 184 B.C. His plays were very popular in his own time, and are generally admired by modern critics. His elegance, refinement, and wit are commended by Cicero and other ancient critics. Horace censures his coarse jests and his versification. The titles of his extant plays are "Amphitruo," "Asinaria," "Aulularia," "Bacchides," "Captivi," "Curculio," "Casina," "Cistellaria," "Epidicus," "Menæchmi," "Mercator," "Miles Gloriosus," "Mostellaria," "Persa," "Pœnulus," "Pseudolus," "Rudens," "Stichus," "Trinummus," and "Truculentus." There is a good English version of Plautus by Bonnel Thornton. The "Captivi" was pronounced the most perfect of comedies by Lessing, who, as a critic, had scarcely any superior.

Play'fair, (JOHN,) an eminent Scottish mathematician and astronomer, born at Benvie, Forfarshire, on the 10th of March, 1748, was educated at the University of Saint Andrew's. He became minister of the parishes of Liff and Benvie in 1773, and professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh in 1785. In 1805 he succeeded Professor Robison as professor of natural philosophy in the same university. He contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" many articles, among which is a review of La Place's "Traité de Mécanique céleste," (1808.) He published "Elements of Geometry," (1795,) which was extensively used in schools, "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth," (1802,) and "Outlines of Natural Philosophy," (2 vols., 1812.) Among his contributions to the "Transactions" of the Edinburgh Royal Society are "Remarks on the Astronomy of the Brahmins." and "On the Solids of Greatest Attraction." Died in 1819. "He possessed in the highest degree," says Jeffrey, "all the characteristics both of a fine and powerful understanding, at once penetrating and vigilant, but more distinguished perhaps for the caution and sureness (or success) of its march than for the brilliancy or rapidity of its movements."

Play'fair, (LYON,) LORD, an English chemist, born in Bengal, in India, in 1819. He studied at Saint Andrew's, and at Giessen under Liebig. He became in 1843 professor of chemistry in the Royal Institution in Manchester, and in 1858 in the University of Edinburgh. He was for a time postmaster-general and then Deputy-Speaker of the House of Commons, and was made vice-president of the Council in 1886. He was made a Knight Commander of the Bath in 1883, and a peer in 1892.

Playfair, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish political writer and ingenious inventor, born near Dundee in 1759, was a brother of Professor John Playfair. He made several useful mechanical inventions. About 1814 he became editor of Galignani's "Messenger," in Paris. He afterwards resided in London. Among his numerous works are a "History of Jacobinism," (1795,) and "British Family Antiquity," (9 vols., 1809–12.) Died in 1823.

Plĕas'on-ton, (ALFRED,) an American general, born in Washington, D. C., in 1824, graduated at West Point in 1844, served with distinction in the Mexican war and against the Indians in the West and in Florida, and in the civil war became in 1862 a brigadier-general of volunteers. He commanded a body of cavalry at Antietam, (1862,) and at Chancellorsville, (1863,) and had the chief command of the Union cavalry at Gettysburg, July 1–3, 1863. He served in Missouri when that State was invaded by General Price in 1864, and at the end of the war was brevetted brigadier-general for eminent services. In 1888 he went on the retired list with the rank of colonel. Died in Washington, February 17, 1897.

Pleg'mund, an English prelate under the reign of Alfred the Great, was made Archbishop of Canterbury in 890 A.D. He was distinguished for his learning and virtues, and was honoured with the friendship of the king. He is supposed to have had a part in the compilation of the "Saxon Chronicle."

Pleiades, plee'ya-dēz, [Gr. Πλειάδες or Πελειάδες; Fr. PLÉIADES, plā'e-ăd'; Eng. PLEIADS, plee'yads,] the daughters of Atlas and Pleione, were seven in number, and were said to be sisters of the Hyades. Their names were ELECTRA, MAIA, TAYGETE, ALCYONE, CELÆNO, STEROPE, and MEROPE. According to one legend, they were attendants of Diana, and, to protect them from the amorous pursuit of Orion, were changed into doves and placed among the stars. They were sometimes called ATLANTIDES.

Plenck, von, fon plĕnk, (JOSEPH JAKOB,) a German surgeon and botanist, born at Vienna in 1738. He published, besides other works, one "On Diseases of the Eyes," ("De Morbis Oculorum," 1777,) and "Figures of Medicinal Plants," ("Icones Plantarum medicinalium," 7 vols., 1788–1804.) Died in 1807.

See MEUSEL, "Gelehrtes Deutschland."

Plessing, plĕs'sing, (FRIEDRICH VICTOR LEBRECHT,) a German philosopher, born near Magdeburg in 1752. He was professor of philosophy at Duisburg, and wrote two works on the philosophy of the ancients, entitled "Osiris and Socrates," (1783,) and "Memnonium, or an Essay to Unveil the Mysteries of Antiquity," (1787.) Died in 1806.

Plessis, plĕs'see', (JOSEPH OCTAVE,) a Canadian archbishop, born at Montreal, March 3, 1762. In 1801 he was consecrated Bishop of Canata in partibus, and made coadjutor to the Bishop of Quebec. This act gave rise to a long controversy with the British government, for the crown had hitherto claimed and exercised the right of presentation to the Roman Catholic bishoprics of Canada. In 1806 he succeeded as Bishop of Quebec, and in 1819 his see was made archiepiscopal. Died at Quebec, December 4, 1825.

Pleyel, plā'ĕl', (JOSEPH ETIENNE CAMILLE,) a composer and pianist, was born at Strasburg about 1790. He became a partner of Kalkbrenner in the fabrication of pianos in Paris. Died in 1855.

Pleyel, (Madame MARIE FÉLICITÉ DENISE MOKE,) a French pianist, wife of the preceding, was born in Paris, July 4, 1811. From an early age her extraordinary gifts attracted the attention of musicians. She made the tour of the principal European cities, and in 1848 went to Berlin as teacher at the Conservatorium, a position which she retained until 1872. Died March 30, 1875.

Pleyl, plīl, or Pleyel, plī'ĕl, (IGNAZ,) a celebrated composer, father of J. E. C. Pleyel, born at Ruppersthal, near Vienna, in 1756 or 1757. Having studied under Haydn and subsequently visited Italy, he was appointed, after his return, chapel-master at Strasburg. In 1795 he settled in Paris, where he established a piano-manufactory and published the "Bibliothèque Musicale." His works are chiefly pieces of instrumental music, which were very popular in his time. Died in 1831.

Plim'soll, (SAMUEL,) an English philanthropist, born at Bristol in 1824. He became prosperous as a coal merchant, and in 1868 began to champion the cause of seamen. In "Our Seamen" he attacked ship-owners so vigourously that the public took up the cause. In 1874 he brought in a bill to establish a fixed load-line, and advocated it so earnestly against vested interests that he won. Since then "Plimsoll's line" has been marked on every English merchantman. Died in 1898.

Plin'ĭ-us Va-le-rĭ-ā'nus, the reputed author of a medical work called "Medicinæ Plinianæ Libri quinque." It is supposed to have been compiled several centuries after the Christian era.

Plĭn'ў [Fr. PLINE, plĕn; It. PLINIO, plee'ne-o] THE ELDER, (or, more fully, Ca'ius Plin'ius Secun'dus,) a celebrated Roman naturalist, was born at Verona, or, according to some authorities, Novum Comum, (the modern Como,) in 23 A.D. He served in the army in Germany, under Lucius Pomponius, and returned to Rome about the age of thirty. He studied law, and practised as a pleader for a few years. He was afterwards procurator in Spain in the reign of Nero, and became a friend and favoured officer of Vespasian. We possess but little other information of his public life, except that at the time of his death he had command of a fleet stationed at Misenum. In August, 79 A.D., occurred a great eruption of Vesuvius. Observing the immense cloud of smoke which arose in the form of a tree from the volcano, he embarked at Misenum on a vessel and approached nearer to the scene of danger. He calmly noted the variations of the portentous phenomenon, amidst the shower of cinders and pumice-stones which fell around his vessel, and landed at Stabia. In the ensuing night he attempted to return to the vessel, but he perished on land, suffocated by ashes or sulphurous exhalations. This was probably the eruption which destroyed the cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum.

He left historical and grammatical works, which are lost. The only work of Pliny that has come down to us is his "Natural History," ("Naturæ Historiarum Libri XXXVII.,") which is thus characterized by Cuvier, (in the "Biographie Universelle:") "It is at the same time one of the most precious monuments that antiquity has left for us, and the evidence of an erudition very wonderful in a warrior and statesman. In order to appreciate justly this vast and celebrated composition, it is necessary to direct our attention to the plan, the facts, and the style. The plan is immense. . . . He includes astronomy, natural philosophy, geography, agriculture, commerce, medicine, and the arts, as well as natural history properly so called. . . . Pliny was not an observer like Aristotle; still less was he a man of genius, capable, like that great philosopher, of tracing the laws and relations in accordance with which the works of nature are formed and arranged, (co-ordonnée.) In general, he is only a compiler. . . . A comparison of his extracts with the originals which are extant, especially with Aristotle, convinces us that Pliny did not prefer to take from the authors he consulted that which was most important or most exact. In general, he prefers the singular and marvellous. . . . If Pliny has for us little merit as a naturalist and critic, it is far otherwise in respect to his talent as a writer, and the vast treasury of Latin terms and locutions which have made his work one of the richest depositories of the language of the Romans." He was a decided pantheist, and had no faith in the future existence of the human soul. His style is vigorous, condensed, pointed, and abounds in antithesis. Among the best editions of Pliny is that published by Sillig, Hamburg. "His profound erudition," says Buffon, "is enhanced by elevation of ideas and nobleness of style. He not only knew all that could be known in his time, but he had that large faculty of thinking which multiplies science, he had that delicacy (finesse) of reflection on which depend elegance and taste, and he imparts to his reader a certain freedom of spirit and boldness of thought, which is the germ of philosophy."

Pliny THE YOUNGER, [Fr. PLINE LE JEUNE, plĕn lĕh zhŭn,] (or, more fully, Cai'us Plin'ius Cæcil'ius Secun'dus,) a Latin author and orator, born at Comum, (now Como,) on Lake Larius, (Lake Como,) in 61 or 62 A.D., was a nephew and adopted son of the preceding. He was a son of Caius Cæcilius and Plinia, a sister of Pliny the Elder. At the age of fourteen he wrote a Greek tragedy. He studied rhetoric under Quintilian, and practised law at Rome. After he had held other high offices, he became, in 103, governor or proconsul of Bithynia. He wrote to Trajan a famous letter, in which he bore testimony to the good morality of the Christians and requested directions in relation to their treatment. Although he was a man of humane disposition, he enforced the law which condemned to death those who refused to abjure their religion. He was a friend of the historian Tacitus. Pliny wrote, besides several works which are lost, a "Panegyric on Trajan," which is greatly admired, and left a collection of Letters, in ten books, which, after those of Cicero, are perhaps the most precious relics of Roman epistolary correspondence that have come down to us. They have been translated into English by Lord Orrery and Mr. Melmoth.

Plitt, (GUSTAV LEOPOLD,) a German divine, born at Genin, March 27, 1836. He studied at Erlangen and Berlin, and in 1867 became professor of church history at Erlangen. He published "Einleitung in die Augustana," (1867–68,) a "Life of Luther," (1883,) and other works. Died at Erlangen, September 10, 1880.

Ploos van Amstel, plōs vän äm'stĕl, (CORNELIS,) a Dutch amateur engraver and designer, born at Amsterdam in 1726. He imitated many drawings of old Italian, Flemish, Dutch, and German masters, and made a rich collection of the engravings of those artists. Died about 1800. A collection of his imitations was published in 1821.

Plot, (ROBERT,) an English naturalist and antiquary, born in Kent in 1641. He became professor of chemistry at Oxford about 1684, and historiographer-royal in 1688. He published a "Natural History of Oxfordshire," (1677,) and a "Natural History of Staffordshire," (1686.) Died in 1696.

Plo-tī'na, (POMPEIA,) the wife of the emperor Trajan, is represented as a woman of excellent character. She died in the reign of Hadrian, who erected a temple in her honour.

Plo-tī'nus, [Gr. Πλωτῖνος; Fr. PLOTIN, plō'tăN'; Ger. PLOTIN, plo-teen',] an eminent Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, was born at Lycopolis, in Egypt, in 204 A.D. He was a pupil of Ammonius Saccas. In order to become versed in the doctrines of the Oriental sages, he accompanied the expedition of Gordian against Parthia in 243. He taught philosophy at Rome from 245 A.D. until his death, and enjoyed the favour of the emperor Gallienus. He had many disciples. He died about 270 A.D., leaving fifty-four books on abstract subjects of philosophy and metaphysics, which are extant and have exerted an important influence in modern times. His life was written by Porphyry, who was his disciple. Plotinus was preferred by Longinus, who knew him well, to all other philosophers of that time. "He was intensely religious," says Hallam, "and if he had come a century later would, instead of a heathen philosopher, have been one of the first names among the saints of the Church."

Among his numerous works is "Ground-Work of Speculative Philosophy," ("Fundamenta Philosophiæ speculativæ," 1759,) in which he expounds the system of Leibnitz. Died in 1790.

See J. L. HUBER, "Ploucquet's Denkmal," 1790.

Plougoulm, ploo'goolm', (PIERRE AMBROISE,) a French judge, born at Rouen in 1796. He was for many years procureur-général, and became a counsellor to the court of cassation in 1854. Died March 17, 1863.

Plŏw'dĕn, (EDMUND,) an eminent English lawyer, born in Shropshire about 1517, was a zealous Roman Catholic. He became a serjeant-at-law in the reign of Queen Mary, and left "Reports or Commentaries" of cases tried in the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth,—a work of high reputation. Died in 1585.

Pluche, plüsh, (NOËL ANTOINE,) an ingenious French writer and naturalist, born at Rheims in 1688. He became a priest or abbé, and lectured on history and geography at Paris. In 1732 he published a description of the outward creation, entitled "Spectacle of Nature," ("Spectacle de la Nature," 9 vols.,) which had great success and was often reprinted. He also wrote a work on cosmogony, entitled "History of the Heavens," ("Histoire du Ciel," 2 vols., 1739,) and other works, and produced a version of the Psalms, which is commended. Died in 1761.

See R. ÉTIENNE, "Éloge de Pluche."

Pluk'e-net, (LEONARD,) an English botanist, born in 1642. Little is known of the events of his life, except that in his old age he was appointed by Queen Mary director of the garden at Hampton Court. He published a work of some merit, entitled "Phytographia," (1691–96,) also "Almagestum Botanicum," (1696,) and "Amaltheum Botanicum," (1705.)

Plum'er, (WILLIAM,) an American Governor, born at Newbury, Massachusetts, in June, 1759. He studied law, and was elected a member of the legislature of New Hampshire eight times, was a Senator of the United States from 1802 to 1807, and was chosen Governor of New Hampshire in 1812. He was re-elected in 1816, 1817, and 1818. His latter years were devoted to literary pursuits. Died at Epping, New Hampshire, in 1850.

Plum'er, (WILLIAM SWAN,) D.D., LL.D., an American Presbyterian divine, born in Darlington, Beaver county, Pennsylvania, July 25, 1802. He graduated at Washington College, in Virginia, in 1825, and took his theological course at Princeton. Most of his pastoral work was done in the Southern cities. In 1854 he was called to a theological professorship in Western Seminary, at Allegheny, Pennsylvania, and in 1866 he accepted a similar professorship in the seminary at Columbia, South Carolina. He published a number of books, exegetical, devotional, etc. Died October 22, 1880.

Plumier, plü'me-ā', (CHARLES,) a distinguished French botanist, born at Marseilles in 1646, was a pupil of Tournefort. He explored the West Indies with Surian in 1689, and, soon after his return, published a "Description of the Plants of America," (1693, with 108 good plates,) which was very favourably received. By the order of the king, he revisited America in 1693 and 1695. In 1703 he produced "New Genera of American Plants," ("Nova Plantarum Americanarum Genera.") He was about to sail for Peru, to make researches on the subject of quinquina, (Peruvian bark,) when he died near Cadiz in 1704. Among his works is a "Treatise on the Ferns of America," (1705, with 172 plates, exquisitely engraved.) "This magnificent collection," says the "Biographie Universelle," "is one of the most admirable monuments of skill and patience that can be named."

Plŭm'mer, (JOHN,) an English poet, born in London in 1831, removed to Northamptonshire. He published a volume entitled "Songs of Labour," (1860,) and is author of numerous essays.

Plum'mer, (JOSEPH B.,) an American general, born in Massachusetts about 1822, graduated at West Point in 1841. He became a captain in 1852, and a brigadier-general of volunteers in October, 1861. He served in several actions in Missouri. Died at Corinth, Mississippi, in October, 1862.

Plum'mer, (WILLIAM EDWARD,) an English astronomer, born at Deptford in 1849. He became director of Liverpool Observatory in 1892, and examiner in astronomy, University of Edinburgh, in 1895. He wrote "On the Motion of the Solar System," "Researches in Cometary Astronomy," etc.

Plŭmp'tre, (EDWARD HAYES,) D.D., an English theologian, born August 6, 1821. He studied at King's College, London, and graduated in 1844 at University College, Oxford, becoming also a Fellow of Brasenose College, and theological lecturer at King's College, London, in which (1853) he was appointed professor of pastoral theology, and (1863) of New Testament exegesis, besides holding professorships in Queen's College, London. In 1881 he was appointed Dean of Wells. He wrote various theological and exegetical works, volumes of poems, sermons, etc. Died in 1891.

Plŭmp'tre, (JAMES,) an English clergyman and dramatist, born in 1770. He obtained the living of Great Gransden in 1812. He wrote "Osway," (1795,) and other dramas, and "Discourses on the Amusements of the Stage," (1810.) Died in 1832.

Plŭm'ridge, (Sir James Hanway,) an English admiral, born in London in 1787. He served as rear-admiral in the Baltic during the Russian war, (1854–55.) Died in 1863.

Plŭnk'et, (Oliver,) a Catholic prelate, born in the county of Meath, Ireland, about 1630. He received from the pope the title of Primate of Ireland in 1669. He was executed at Tyburn, on a charge of treason, in 1681; but his innocence was afterwards proved.

Plŭnk'ett or Plunket, (William Conyngham,) first Lord Plunkett, an eminent Irish orator and judge, was born at Enniskillen in July, 1764. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and was called to the bar in 1787. Having been elected to the Irish Parliament, he acquired distinction by his impassioned speeches against the union with England, in 1800. He acted as consul for the insurgents who were engaged in the rebellion of 1798. He became solicitor-general for Ireland in 1803, and attorney-general in 1805, but retired from office with the Whigs in 1807. In the same year he was elected to the British House of Commons, in which he voted with the Whigs and made a few speeches that were greatly applauded. He was returned to Parliament for the University of Dublin in 1812, and again in 1818. He was a zealous advocate of Catholic emancipation. He was lord chief justice of the common pleas in Ireland for three years, (1827–30.) About 1827 he was created a peer of the United Kingdom. He was lord chancellor of Ireland from 1830 to 1841, excepting an interval of some months in 1834–35. He died in 1854, leaving the title to his son.

See the "Life, Letters, etc. of Lord Plunkett," London, 1867; "Edinburgh Review" for July and October, 1867; "Fraser's Magazine" for June, 1867.

Plunkett, (William Conyngham,) Lord, an Irish archbishop, born in 1828. He succeeded his father, the third Lord Plunkett, in 1871. In 1876 he became Bishop of Meath, (Anglican,) and in 1885 he succeeded Dr. R. C. Trench as Archbishop of Dublin. Died in 1897.

Pluquet, plü'kĕ', (François André Adrien,) a learned and judicious French writer, born at Bayeux in 1716. He published in 1757 an "Inquiry into Fatalism," (3 vols.,) which is commended. His best or most popular work is a "Dictionary of Heresies," (2 vols., 1762.) He obtained in 1776 a chair of moral philosophy in the Collége de France, Paris. He published a translation of the classic books of the Chinese, collected by Père Noël, (7 vols., 1786.) Died in 1790.

See Quérard, "La France Littéraire;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Pluquet, (Frédéric,) an antiquary, born at Bayeux in 1788, was a nephew of the preceding. He wrote many works on French antiquities. Died in 1834.

Plū'tarch, [Gr. Πλούταρχος; Lat. Plutar'chus; Fr. Plutarque, plü'tärk'; It. Plutarco, ploo-tar'ko,] an eminent Greek philosopher or moralist, and the greatest biographer of antiquity, was a native of Chæronea, in Bœotia. He was born probably about 50 A.D., as, according to his own statement, he studied philosophy under Ammonius, at Delphi, in 66 A.D. He passed some time at Rome, where he lectured on philosophy, in the reign of Vespasian or of one of his sons. "When I was in Rome and other parts of Italy," says Plutarch, "I had not leisure to study the Latin tongue, on account of the public commissions with which I was charged, and the number of people that came to be instructed by me in philosophy. It was not, therefore, until a late period in life that I began to read the Roman authors." ("Life of Demosthenes.") Plutarch resided at his native place in the latter part of his life, and filled several municipal offices. "As to myself," says he, "I live in a little town, and I choose to live there, lest it should become still less." He had a wife named Timoxena, and several children. On the death of his infant daughter he wrote to his wife a consolatory letter, in which he commemorated her conjugal and maternal virtues, with an infusion of the antique sentiments and poetic allusions which render his writings so attractive. He was an admirer of the philosophy of Plato, and a decided opponent of Epicureanism. The date of his death is not known; but it is supposed that he attained the age of seventy or more.

Plutarch was a very prolific writer. His works, by their extent and variety, constitute perhaps the most copious treasury of facts, ideas, and traditions which we have inherited from antiquity. There is no uninspired Greek prose author whose works have found in modern times so many readers and admirers. His principal work is his "Parallel Lives" (Βίοι Παράλληλοι) of eminent Greeks and Romans, arranged in pairs. The biography of each Greek is accompanied by the life of some Roman as a pendant, and the latter is followed by a rather minute comparison, in which the two persons are measured together, trait for trait. The best English versions of Plutarch's "Lives" are those of Sir Thomas North, (1612,) of Langhorne, (1771,) and of Arthur Hugh Clough, (1859.) Among the extant works of Plutarch are many moral essays, which were translated into French by Amyot. His morality, less rigid than that of the Stoics and less speculative than that of Plato, is generally pure and practical. Among his lost works are a "Commentary on Homer," and biographies of Pindar, Hesiod, Scipio, Epaminondas, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero.

Respecting Plutarch's merits as a writer, we extract the following passage from an article in the "Biographie Universelle," by M. Villemain. Alluding to Plutarch's truthful and naïve minuteness in the delineation of his characters, that great critic remarks, "Perhaps this merit, which all recognize in Plutarch, has diverted attention from the picturesque beauty of his style; but it is this double character of eloquence and truth which has rendered him so powerful over all vivid imaginations. . . . This immortal vivacity of the style of Plutarch, seconded by a happy choice of the noblest subjects that can occupy the imagination and the thoughts, explains the prodigious interest excited by his historical works. He has painted man as he is; he has worthily recorded the greatest characters and most admirable actions of the human species. The attraction of such reading will never pass away; it appeals to all ages and conditions of life; it kindles the enthusiasm of youth, and commends itself to the sober wisdom of age."

Pluto, the Italian of Plutus, which see.

Plu'to, [Gr. Πλούτων; Fr. Pluton, plü'tôN'; It. Plutone, ploo-to'nà,] the god of the infernal regions, was also called Hades, Orcus, Dis, and Aïdoneus. He was said to be a son of Saturn (Cronus or Kronos) and Rhea, and a brother of Jupiter and Neptune. According to the fable, these three brothers agreed to a division of the world, and Pluto obtained as his portion the subterranean region, the realm of shades, which was called Erebus or Hades, and the entrance of which was guarded by Cerberus, a dog with three heads. Some poets imagined that the realm of Pluto was divided into two regions,—namely, Tartarus, in which the wicked were confined and punished, and Elysium, or the Elysian Fields, the abode of the good.

The most remarkable features in the geography of the infernal world were five rivers,—namely, Ach'eron, Cocy'tus, Styx, Phleg'ethon, and Le'the, (Gr. Λήθη,) the river of Oblivion. Departed souls about to enter Elysium drank of the river Lethe and forgot all their troubles, or, as some say, forgot all the past:

> "Securos latices et longa oblivia potant."*
> Virgil: Æneid, book vi. 715.

The Styx was said to encompass the kingdom of Pluto seven or nine times with its circumvolutions, and was described as a sluggish stream, for which reason it was sometimes called the Stygian pool or lake. The souls of the dead were carried across the Styx in a boat by Charon. The gods usually swore by the river Styx. Phlegethon was described as a river of fire, and Cocytus as a branch or affluent of the STYX, which see.

* "They quaff profound oblivion, secure from pain and woe."

Among the most celebrated adventures of Pluto was the abduction of Proserpine, whom he married. The poets feigned that he possessed a helmet which rendered the wearer invisible. (See an ample and admirable description of Pluto's dominions in Virgil's "Æneid," book vi. passim.)

Plu'tus, [Gr. Πλοῦτος; It. PLUTO, ploo'to,] in the Greek mythology, the god of riches, was said to be a son of Iasion and Ceres. The poets relate that Jupiter deprived him of sight in order that he might distribute riches blindly and bestow his favours indiscriminately on the evil and the good. He was represented as lame, because he generally comes so slowly to those who seek him; yet he had wings, to indicate how swiftly he often forsakes those whom he seems most to favour. (See KUVERA.)

Pluvinel, de, dẹh plü've'nĕl', (ANTOINE,) a Frenchman, noted for his skill in horsemanship, was born in Dauphiné in 1555. He was under-governor (sous-gouverneur) of the dauphin, (Louis XIII.,) and wrote a work called "Manége Royal," (1623.) Died in 1620.

Plŭ'vĭ-us, (i.e. "the rainy,") a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, who invoked him during long droughts.

Pluymer, ploi'mẹr, (JAN,) a mediocre Dutch poet, born at Amsterdam, wrote during the reign of William III. of England, and published a volume of verses in 1691.

Po, del, dĕl po, (PIETRO,) an Italian painter and engraver, born at Palermo in 1610, was a pupil of Domenichino. Died at Naples in 1692. His son GIACOMO, born at Rome in 1654, was a painter. He worked at Naples with success. Died in 1726.

Po-ca-hon'tas, daughter of Powhatan, an Indian chief of Virginia, is celebrated for her heroism in interceding for the life of Captain Smith, who was condemned to death by her father. She was afterwards converted to Christianity, and married to John Rolfe, an English gentleman. Among her descendants in Virginia was the celebrated John Randolph. Died in 1617.

Poccetti, pot-chet'tee, properly Bernardino Barbatelli, (bar-bȧ-tel'lee,) a skilful Italian painter, born at Florence about 1542. He painted figures, landscapes, flowers, and draperies with success, and displayed a great fertility of invention. Among his works is "The Mission of the Apostles." "He was considered," says Périès, "the Paul Veronese of his school." Died at Florence in 1612.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Pocci, pot'chee, (FRANZ,) COUNT, a poet and designer, of Italian origin, was born at Munich in 1807. He wrote verses and tales. Died May 7, 1876.

Pochard, po'shȧr', (JEAN,) a French ecclesiastic, born near Pontarlier in 1715. He wrote "Method for the Guidance of Souls," ("Méthode pour la Direction des Ames," 1772.) Died in 1786.

Pocholle, po'shol', (PIERRE POMPONNE AMÉDÉE,) a French revolutionist, born at Dieppe in 1764, was a member of the Convention of 1792. Died in 1832.

Pockels, pok'kẹls, (KARL FRIEDRICH,) a German moralist, born near Halle in 1757. He wrote, besides other works, "An Essay on the Character of Women," (5 vols., 1799–1802,) and "Man," ("Der Mann," 4 vols., 1805–08.) Died in 1814.

Po'cock, (EDWARD,) an eminent English divine and Orientalist, born at Oxford in 1604, studied in Corpus Christi College. He passed about six years at Aleppo as chaplain to the English merchants, (1630–36,) and learned Arabic, Syriac, Hebrew, etc. In 1636 he became the first professor of Arabic at Oxford. Pocock is said to have been the best Arabic scholar of his time in England. He was presented to the rectory of Childrey in 1643, and obtained the chair of Hebrew at Oxford in 1648. He published in 1648–50 "Specimen Historiæ Arabum," consisting of extracts from the History of Aboolfaraj, (Abulpharagius,) with a Latin version and notes. His most important work is a Latin translation of the entire History of the same author, which was published (with the original text) in 1663, in two volumes. Died at Oxford in 1691.

See a "Life of E. Pocock," prefixed to his theological works, by LEONARD TWELLS, 1740.

Pocock, (EDWARD,) an Oriental scholar, a son of the preceding, was born about 1646. He published in 1671 the Arabic text, with a Latin version, of a work of Ibn-Tofayl, "Self-Taught Philosopher," ("Philosophus autodidactos.")

Pocock, (ISAAC,) an English painter and dramatist, born at Bristol in 1782; died in 1835.

Pococke, po'kok, (RICHARD,) an English traveller, born at Southampton in 1704. He travelled in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, etc. in 1734–41, and published a "Description of the East and of Some Other Countries," (3 vols., 1743–45,) which was highly esteemed. He became Bishop of Ossory in 1756, and Bishop of Meath in 1765. Among his other works is a "Description of the Giants' Causeway." Died in 1765.

Poczobut, de, dẹh potch'o-boot, (MARTIN,) a Polish astronomer, born near Grodno in 1729; died in 1810.

Podestà, po-dĕs-tȧ', (GIAMBATTISTA,) an Italian Orientalist, born in Istria. He became professor of Arabic at Vienna in 1674, and published "Grammatical Course of Oriental Languages," ("Cursus grammaticalis Linguarum Orientalium," 3 vols., 1687–1703.)

Podiebrad, pod-yā'brȧd, (GEORGE,) King of Bohemia, born in 1420. He commanded an army of Hussites in the civil war about 1450, and was elected king in 1458, with the concurrence of the Catholic nobles. In 1466 he was excommunicated by Pope Paul II., because he maintained the right of communion under two forms. The pope also caused a crusade to be preached against him. In 1467 he was involved in a war against Matthias Corvinus, whom he defeated. He is said to have been an able and patriotic ruler. He died in 1471, and was succeeded by Ladislaus of Poland.

See M. JORDAN, "Das Königthum Georgs Podiebrad," 1861; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Poe, po, (EDGAR ALLAN,) a distinguished American poet, born in Boston, January 19, 1809. He graduated at the University of Virginia, and, having spent a year in Europe, became successively editor of the "Southern Literary Messenger" at Charleston, and the "Gentleman's Magazine" and "Graham's Magazine" at Philadelphia. In 1844 he took charge of the "Broadway Journal," New York. He died at Baltimore, in 1849, of delirium tremens. Among his principal prose works are "The Fall of the House of Usher," "Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque," and "The Gold Bug." His "Raven" and other small poems have been much admired. He also wrote a collection of critical essays. "His poems," says R. W. Griswold, "are constructed with wonderful ingenuity and finished with consummate art. They illustrate a morbid sensitiveness of feeling, a shadowy and gloomy imagination, and a taste almost faultless in the apprehension of that sort of beauty most agreeable to his temper."

See GRISWOLD, "Poets and Poetry of America," and a "Memoir of Poe," prefixed to a collection of his works published by R. W. GRISWOLD, in 3 vols.; "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1858; "North American Review" for October, 1856; "Fraser's Magazine" for June, 1857.

Poey, pō′à, (ANDRÉS,) a Cuban scientist, a son of Felipe Poey, was born at Havana in 1827. He wrote many works on meteorology. He published and edited a series of works called "La Bibliothèque positiviste," (1875 et seq.)

Poey, (FELIPE,) a Cuban zoologist, born in Havana in 1802. While a law-student in Madrid he had to escape to Paris, being involved in some political conspiracy. After 1830 he went to Havana, where he became professor of natural history in the university. He published "La Centurie des Lépidoptères," (1828,) works on Cuba, (1840, 1842,) "Geografía universal," (1842,) "Memorias sobre la Historia de la Isla de Cuba," (1864,) etc. He published accounts of more than two hundred and thirty species of fishes before undescribed, and has attained distinction in general literature.

Pogge, Le. See POGGIO.

Poggendorf, pog′gĕn-dorf′, (JOHANN CHRISTIAN,) a German savant and professor of natural philosophy at Berlin, was born at Hamburg in 1796. He became in 1824 editor of the "Annals of Physics and Chemistry." Among his principal works is a treatise "On the Magnetism of the Voltaic Pile," in which he was the first to explain the principles of the multiplicator and its application. Died January 24, 1877.

Poggi, de', dà pod′jee, (GIUSEPPE,) CHEVALIER, an Italian writer, born near Piacenza in 1761. He was a member of the French legislative body from 1811 to 1814. He wrote "On Sincere Reformation," ("Delle Emende sincere," 3 vols., 1791,) and other works. Died in France in 1842.

Poggiani, pod-jā′nee, (GIULIO,) an Italian scholar, born at Suna, on Lake Maggiore, in 1522. He was secretary of Carlo Borromeo. He left "Epistles and Orations," in Latin, (4 vols., 1756–62,) which are said to be elegant. Died in 1568.

Poggio Bracciolini, pod′jo brăt-cho-lee′nee, [Fr. LE POGGE, lẹh pozh,] (GIOVANNI FRANCESCO,) a distinguished Italian scholar and reviver of learning, was born near Florence in 1380. He was a pupil of John of Ravenna, was appointed apostolic secretary about 1413, and served several successive popes in that capacity. He rendered important services to literature by the discovery of ancient manuscripts, for which he searched in monasteries. He discovered seven orations of Cicero, twelve plays of Plautus, the commentaries of Asconius Pedianus, the history of Ammianus Marcellinus, and other classic works. He wrote satires against the monks and clergy, and against Filelfo, with whom he was involved in a long and acrimonious controversy. In 1435 he married a young lady named Selvaggia Buondelmonti. After this event he resided many years at Florence, and published in 1437 a collection of letters, which were greatly admired. Having passed several years in Rome, he returned to Florence about 1450, and was appointed chancellor there in 1453. Among his works, which are all in Latin, are a "Dialogue on Nobility," ("De Nobilitate Dialogus,") a "History of Florence from 1350 to 1455," ("Historia Florentina," etc., 1476,) and "On the Mutability of Fortune," ("De Varietate Fortunæ.") He died in Florence in October, 1459.

Pogodin, pọ-gọ-deen′, (MIKHAIL PETROVITCH,) a Russian historical writer, born at Moscow in 1800. In 1833 he was appointed a professor in the Moscow University, and ten years later devoted himself to archæological studies. His "Isledovania, Zamietchaniya i Lektzie" (7 vols., 1846–54) is highly valued as an authority on Old Russian history. He also wrote novels and dramas, and a celebrated series of panslavistic letters. Died in 1875.

Pohl, pōl, (CARL FERDINAND,) a German musician, composer, and writer on music, born at Darmstadt, September 6, 1819. He published "Mozart and Haydn in London," (1867,) and other works, and prepared a biography of Haydn, (vol. i., 1875.)

Pohl, pōl, (JOHANN CHRISTOPH,) a German physician, born near Liegnitz in 1706; died in 1780.

Pohl, (JOHANN EMANUEL,) a German botanist, born at Vienna in 1784. He published, in Latin, "Descriptions and Figures of Brazilian Plants," (2 vols., 1827–31,) and, in German, "Travels in Brazil," (2 vols., 1832.) Died in 1834.

Poilly, de, dẹh pwâ′ye′, (FRANÇOIS,) an eminent French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1622. He worked in Rome and Paris, and engraved some works of Raphael, Giulio Romano, and Poussin. In 1664 he received the title of engraver to the king. Died in Paris in 1693.

Poilly, de, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a skilful engraver, a nephew of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1669; died in Paris in 1728.

Poilly, de, (NICOLAS,) an engraver, born at Abbeville in 1626, was the father of the preceding. He was not equal to his brother François. Died in 1696.

Poin'dex-ter, (GEORGE,) an able American statesman and jurist, born in Louisa county, Virginia. Having removed to Mississippi, he was appointed in 1813 United States judge for that district, and was elected to Congress in 1817. He there distinguished himself by his eloquent defence of the course of General Jackson in the Seminole war. He was afterwards elected Governor of the State, and in 1831 a Senator of the United States. He became an opponent of President Jackson, and ceased to be a Senator in 1835. Died in 1853.

Poin'sett, (JOEL ROBERTS,) a distinguished American statesman and diplomatist, born at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1779. Having been several times elected to Congress, he was sent in 1825 as minister to Mexico by President Adams. In the contest between the Nullification and Union parties he became the leader of the latter. He was appointed secretary of war by President Van Buren in March, 1837. He retired from that office in March, 1841, after which he was not employed in the public service. He wrote "Notes on Mexico." Died in December, 1851.

See the "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. i.; "Democratic Review" for February and March, 1838, (with a portrait.)

Poinsinet, pwăN′se′nā′, (ANTOINE ALEXANDRE HENRI,) a French dramatist, born at Fontainebleau in 1735. He wrote several successful comedies and comic operas, among which is "The Circle, or Soirée à la Mode," (1771.) He was accidentally drowned at Córdova, in Spain, in 1769.

Poinsinet de Sivry, pwăN′se′nā′ dẹh se′vre′, (LOUIS,) a French littérateur, born at Versailles in 1733. He produced a popular tragedy, named "Briséis," (1759,) and various other works of little merit. He translated Pliny's "Natural History," (1771–81.) He was a brother-in-law of Palissot. Died in 1804.

Poinsot, pwăN′so′, (LOUIS,) a French geometer, born in Paris in 1777. He published in 1803 "Elements of Statics," which presents new and ingenious ideas. Among his other works is a "Memoir on the Application of Algebra to the Theory of Numbers," (1820.)

Poisson, (SIMÉON DENIS,) an excellent and profound French geometer, born at Pithiviers (Loiret) on the 21st of June, 1781. He entered the Polytechnic School in 1798, and attracted the notice of La Grange and La Place. He became professor in the same school in 1802, a member of the Bureau of Longitudes in 1808, a member of the Institute in 1812, and counsellor of the University in 1820. In 1811 he published an excellent treatise on mechanics, "Traité de Mécanique," (2 vols.) In his "New Theory of Capillary Action" (1831) he completes the researches of La Place by superadding the consideration of the variation of density. He published a "Mathematical Theory of Heat," (2 vols., 1835,) and a treatise on the theory of probabilities applied to judicial trials, "Recherches sur la Probabilité des Jugements," etc., (1837.) He also contributed more than three hundred memoirs to various journals and periodicals. Among these is a remarkable treatise "On the Invariability of the Mean Movements of the Grand Planetary Axes." It was in the domain of mathematical physics that the genius of Poisson was most signally displayed. He brought this science to great perfection, especially in its application to static electricity and magnetism. In 1837 he was raised to the dignity of a peer of France, although he never was a politician. Died in April, 1840.

Pōle, [Lat. PO'LUS,] (REGINALD,) a celebrated English cardinal and scholar, was born in Staffordshire in 1500. His mother, Margaret Plantagenet, was a niece of Edward IV., a daughter of George, Duke of Clarence, and cousin-german to Queen Elizabeth who was the mother of Henry VIII. He was educated at Oxford, and became Dean of Exeter at the age of nineteen. He pursued his studies at Padua, where he formed friendships with Erasmus, Bembo, and Sadolet, and returned to England in 1525. About 1531 he lost the favour of Henry VIII. by his opposition to the divorce of Queen Catherine. Having retired to the continent for safety, he wrote a famous treatise "For the Unity of the Church," ("Pro Unitate Ecclesiæ,") printed at Rome without date, in which he controverted the pretensions of Henry to be the head of the Church. His mother and brother were executed by order of the king, and he was attainted. On the accession of Queen Mary (1553) he was sent by the pope as legate to England. He succeeded Cranmer as Archbishop of Canterbury in 1555 or 1556. Historians are divided in opinion in relation to his complicity in the persecutions of this reign; and his character is commonly represented as mild and humane. Died in 1558.

Polhem, pol'hĕm, or Polhelm, pol'hĕlm, (KRISTOFER,) a Swedish engineer and mechanician, born in Gothland in 1661. He invented several useful machines, constructed the docks at Carlscrona, and obtained a title of nobility. Died in 1751.

Poli, po'lee, (GIUSEPPE SAVERIO,) an Italian naturalist and physiologist, born at Molfetta, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1746. He became professor of geography and history in a military school at Naples about 1776, after which he was sent by the king to France and England to examine educational institutions and procure scientific apparatus. He was the preceptor of the prince who reigned as Francis I. His reputation is chiefly founded on an excellent work on testaceous mollusca, "History and Anatomy of the Testacea of the Two Sicilies," ("Testacea utriusque Siciliæ eorumque Historia et Anatome," 2 vols., 1791–95.) The third volume was published in 1826. "This magnificent work," says Cuvier, "represents their anatomy with much accuracy, and throws new light on their physiology." Died in 1825.

Polignac, de, dĕh po'lĕn'yăk', (AUGUSTE JULES ARMAND MARIE,) PRINCE, a French minister of state, born at Versailles in 1780. His mother, the Duchess of Polignac, was a favourite of Marie Antoinette. He became minister of foreign affairs in August, 1829, and the chief minister before the end of the year. His ultramontane and absolutist policy rendered him very unpopular. In consequence of the victory of the liberals and insurgents over Charles X. in 1830, he was arrested, tried for treason, and condemned to imprisonment for life. He was released in 1836, and retired to England. Died in 1847.

See "Quarterly Review" for October, 1832, (by SOUTHEY.)

Polignac, de, (MELCHIOR,) a French diplomatist and Latin poet, born at Puy-en-Velay (Upper Loire) in 1661. He was sent in 1695 as ambassador to Poland, where by his address he induced a majority of the electors to choose the French prince De Conti as king in 1697. He succeeded Bossuet in the French Academy in 1704. In 1712 he was sent as plenipotentiary to the Congress of Utrecht. He became a cardinal in 1713. He acquired a high literary reputation by his Latin poem (in refutation of Lucretius) entitled "Anti-Lucretius, sive de Deo et Natura Libri novem," (1745.) Died in 1742. Voltaire, in his "Temple du Goût," praises Polignac as a successful opponent of Lucretius, and as one who combined the qualities of Virgil and Plato:

"Réunissant Virgile avec Platon, Vengeur du Ciel et vainqueur de Lucrèce."

Politian, po-lish'e-an, [It. Poliziano, po-lèt-se-â'no; Lat. Politia'nus; Fr. Politien, po'le'se-â'n',] (Angelo,) a celebrated Italian classical scholar and poet, born at Montepulciano, (Mons Politianus,) in Tuscany, in July, 1454. His family name was Ambrogini. He studied Latin under Cristoforo Landino, and Greek under Andronicus of Thessalonica. About 1468 he wrote stanzas, in Italian, in honour of Giuliano de' Medici, which were much admired. He was patronized by Lorenzo de' Medici, who employed him as preceptor of his sons and treated him as a friend as long as he lived. As professor of Greek and Latin at Florence, he acquired a high reputation. He produced elegant Latin versions of the History of Herodian, of the Manual of Epictetus, and of the "Charmides" of Plato. He wrote notes on Ovid, Catullus, Pliny the Younger, and other Latin authors. Among his works are Latin odes and epigrams, and a Latin poem called "Rusticus." "In his Latin poems," says Ginguené, "we find the fire of an imagination truly poetic, and that taste and elegance which were the natural attributes of his mind." Died at Florence in 1494.

"In 1480 or 1483," says Hallam, "Politian was placed in the chair of Greek and Latin eloquence at Florence, a station perhaps the most conspicuous and the most honourable which any scholar could occupy. It is beyond controversy that he stands at the head of that class in the fifteenth century. The envy of some of his contemporaries attested his superiority. In 1489 he published his once celebrated 'Miscellanea,' consisting of one hundred observations illustrating passages of Latin authors." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") He was characterized by Erasmus as "rarum naturæ miraculum," ("a rare miracle of nature.")

Polk, pōk, (James Knox,) the eleventh President of the United States, was born in Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, on the 2d of November, 1795, and removed with his father to Middle Tennessee in 1806. He graduated in the University of North Carolina about 1816, and studied law. He was elected a member of Congress from Tennessee in 1825 and at several succeeding elections. In 1835 he was chosen Speaker of the House of Representatives by the Democrats. He was also Speaker of the twenty-fifth Congress, (1837–38.) In 1839 he was elected Governor of Tennessee for two years. At the election of 1841 he was defeated by the Whig candidate for Governor. In 1844 Polk and Dallas were nominated for the offices of President and Vice-President by the Democratic National Convention, which on the first ballot had not given Mr. Polk a single vote. His competitor was Henry Clay. The principal issue in this election was the annexation of Texas, which Mr. Polk was pledged to promote. He was elected, receiving one hundred and seventy electoral votes out of two hundred and seventy-five, which was the whole number. He appointed James Buchanan secretary of state, and afterwards the formal annexation of Texas to the Union (1845) involved the country in an aggressive war against Mexico, which began in May, 1846. The army of the United States, commanded by General Scott, after several victories, took the city of Mexico in September, 1847. The Mexicans obtained peace by the cession of Upper California and New Mexico. A dispute with the British government about the boundary of Oregon was settled during his administration, by an agreement that the parallel of 49° should be the dividing line. He retired from office in March, and died at Nashville in June, 1849.

Polk, (Leonidas,) an American who became famous for his twofold character of bishop and general, was born at Raleigh, North Carolina, in 1806, and graduated at West Point in 1827. He was ordained an Episcopal clergyman about 1831, and was chosen Bishop of Louisiana in 1841. In 1861 he took arms against the Union, with the rank of major-general, and distinguished himself by his activity and zeal in the Confederate service. He occupied Columbus, Kentucky, in September, 1861, and evacuated it about the 1st of March, 1862. He commanded a division at the battle of Shiloh, April, 1862, and served as lieutenant-general at the battle of Stone River, which ended January 2, 1863. He led a corps at the battle of Chickamauga, September 19–20, 1863. He was killed near Kenesaw Mountain, Georgia, in June, 1864.

Polk, (Leonidas L.,) agriculturist, was born in Anson county, North Carolina, in 1837. He was in the Confederate army during the war, began publishing "The Progressive Farmer" in 1886, and organized in his State in 1887 five hundred clubs of the Farmers' Alliance. He presided over the conventions of the Alliance in 1890 and 1891. Died in 1892.

Pol'ko, (Elise,) a German novelist, a sister of Eduard Vogel, (q. v.) She was born at Minden, January 31, 1823. Among her works are "Musical Sketches," (1852 et seq.,) "New Novels," (1861 et seq.,) "Fair Women," (1865–69,) etc.

Pollajuolo, pol-lâ-yoo-o'lo, (Antonio,) an eminent Italian painter and sculptor, born at Florence in 1426 or 1431, was also a skilful goldsmith. His master-piece of painting is "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." He was invited to Rome by Innocent VIII., for whom (with the aid of his brother Pietro) he made a monument to Sixtus IV. He excelled in composition and in knowledge of anatomy. Died in 1498.

Pollard, (Josephine,) an American author, born at New York city about 1842. She early engaged in literary work, writing religious and children's books; also "Vagrant Verses," (1887,) "Favourite Birds, and what Poets sing of them," (1888.) Died in 1892.

Pollet, po'lâ', (Joseph Michel Ange,) a French sculptor, born at Palermo in 1814. He became a resident of Paris about 1844, and obtained a first medal in 1850. His works adorn the Tuileries and other imperial palaces. Died December 31, 1870.

Pollet, (Victor Florence,) a French painter and engraver, born in Paris about 1810. He gained by his engravings the prize of Rome in 1838, and a medal of the first class in 1849. Died December 11, 1882.

Pollich, pol'lik, (Johann Adam,) a German naturalist, born at Lautern in 1740. He published a good Flora of the Palatinate, "Historia Plantarum in Palatinatu Electorali sponte nascentium," (1776.) Died in 1780.

Pollich, [Lat. Pollich'ius,] (Martin,) a German physician, eminent for learning, born at Mellerstadt, was an ancestor of the preceding. He became in 1503 professor of theology in the University of Wittenberg, of which he was the first rector. He published "Laconismi," (1504,) and other works. Died in 1513.

Pollichius. See POLLICH.

Pol'lĭ-o, (ASINIUS,) a sophist or philosopher, born at Tralles, in Asia Minor. He taught at Rome about 50 B.C., and, according to Suidas, wrote a commentary on Aristotle's treatise "On Animals."

Pol'lĭ-o, [Fr. POLLION, po'le'ôN',] (CAIUS ASINIUS,) an eminent Roman orator, author, and patron of literature, was born at Rome in 76 B.C. He was a partisan of Cæsar in the civil war which began in 49 B.C., and crossed the Rubicon with that chief. He took part in the battle of Pharsalia, in 48, and commanded in Spain against Sextus Pompey at the time of Cæsar's death, 44 B.C. Having taken arms for Antony and Octavius, he obtained the office of consul by their influence in 40 B.C. and saved the patrimony of Virgil from confiscation. Virgil addressed to him the fourth eclogue in 40 B.C., and the eighth eclogue soon after that date. Pollio retired from the public service about the year 38, and remained neutral in the war between Octavius and Antony. He founded the first public library at Rome, and patronized Virgil, Horace, and other poets. He wrote a valuable history of the civil wars of Rome, and several poems, which were praised by Virgil. None of these works are extant. His excellence as an orator is attested by Quintilian and other ancient writers. He was also distinguished as a critic. He had a son named C. Asinius Gallus. (See GALLUS.) Died in 4 A.D.

Pollio, (TREBELLIUS,) a Roman historian who lived in the reign of Constantine I. He was one of the authors of the "Historia Augusta," to which he contributed the lives of the two Valerians, of the two Gallieni, of the Thirty Tyrants, and of Claudius.

Pollion. See POLLIO.

Pöllnitz or Poellnitz, pöl'nits, (KARL LUDWIG,) a German adventurer and historical writer, born at Issoudun (Prussia) in 1692. He sought fortune at several courts of Europe, and was appointed grand master of ceremonies by Frederick the Great. He wrote, besides other works, "Saxe galante," (1737,) which narrates the amours of King Augustus, and Memoirs of his own life and times, ("Mémoires du Baron de Poellnitz," 3 vols., 1734.) Died in 1775.

Pol'lock, (Sir FREDERICK,) an English judge, born in London in 1783. He became attorney-general in 1834, and lord chief baron of the exchequer in 1844, which position he held until 1866. Died in 1870.

Pol'lock, (JAMES,) an American Governor, born in Pennsylvania, graduated at Princeton College in 1831. He represented a district of Pennsylvania in Congress from 1843 to 1849, and was elected Governor of that State by the People's party, or Republicans, for three years, (1855–58.) Died April 19, 1890.

Pollock, (WALTER HERRIES,) an English author, son of Sir Frederick, was born at London in 1850. He became sub-editor of the "Saturday Review," and was its editor 1884–94. He published several collections of poems, "Lectures on French Poets," etc., and, with Walter Besant, "The Ballad-Monger," a play. His brother, Sir FREDERICK, was author of legal and other works.

Pol'lok, (ROBERT,) a British poet, born at Muirhouse, in Renfrewshire, Scotland, in 1798 or 1799. He studied at the University of Glasgow, and chose the profession of minister of the gospel. He obtained a license as minister in the United Secession Church in 1827, but his health was already fatally impaired by excessive study. His reputation is founded on "The Course of Time," (1827,) a didactic poem, which found many admirers, especially among those who take an interest in religious poetry. It contains some beautiful and many powerful passages, but it has great defects, and is not considered very attractive as a poem, apart from its religious and moral doctrines. "The Course of Time," says Moir, "is a very extraordinary poem, vast in its conception, vast in its plan, vast in its materials, and vast, if very far from perfect, in its achievement." "The Course of Time," says Professor Wilson, "for so young a man, was a vast achievement. . . . He had much to learn in composition. . . . But the soul of poetry is there, though often dimly envcloped; and many passages there are, and long ones too, that heave and hurry and glow along in a divine enthusiasm." He wrote, in prose, "Tales of the Covenanters." Died near Southampton in September, 1827.

Pol'lux, a demi-god of classic mythology, and a brother of Castor. See CASTOR and POLLUX.

Pol'lux, (JULIUS,) a Greek grammarian, whose proper name was POLYDEUCES, was born at Naucratis, in Egypt, about 130 A.D. He enjoyed the favour of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus, and taught rhetoric at Athens in the reign of the latter. His works are all lost, except his "Onomasticon," a kind of dictionary of Greek words, (not in alphabetical order,) which is highly prized. He died at the age of fifty-eight.

See FABRICIUS, "Bibliotheca Græca."

Pol'lux, (JULIUS,) a Byzantine writer, who lived in the tenth or eleventh century. He wrote a "Chronicle, or Universal History from the Creation to the Time of Valens," which is extant.

Po'lo, (GASPAR GIL,) a Spanish poet and novelist, born at Valencia about the middle of the sixteenth century. He was a lawyer and a professor of Greek. He gained celebrity by a poetical romance, entitled "Diana in Love," ("Diana enamorada,") which was translated into English, French, and Latin.

See LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe."

Polo, (JAYME,) called THE ELDER, a Spanish painter, born at Burgos in 1560, was a good colorist. Died in 1600.

Polo, (JAYME,) THE YOUNGER, a painter, born at Burgos in 1620; died at Madrid in 1655.

Po'lo, (MARCO,) [Fr. MARC POL, märk pol, (or PAUL, pōl,)] a famous Venetian traveller, born about 1252, was a son of Niccolò Polo, a merchant of noble rank. About 1255 Niccolò and his brother Matteo, or Maffeo, commenced an extensive expedition, with a stock of precious stones, which they sold to a Tartar chief on the Volga. They arrived in 1261 at Bokhara, where they learned the Mongol language. Accepting the invitation of a Persian envoy whom they met at Bokhara, they accompanied him to the court of Kooblai Khan, the Great Mogul, who ruled over China and Tartary. This prince received them favourably, and accredited them as his ambassadors to the pope, whom he desired to send to him a hundred learned men to teach his Mongol subjects. They returned home in 1269, and found that the pope had died in 1268. His successor, who was not elected until 1271 or 1272, gave them letters to Kooblai Khan, to whom they returned accompanied by young Marco. They arrived at the court of Kooblai in 1275. Marco learned several Asiatic languages, and obtained the favour of the Khan, who sent him on important missions to China and other provinces. He was the first European that entered China, in which he passed several years. Having obtained the consent of Kooblai Khan, the three Venetians quitted his service about 1292, and, embarking on the coast of China, came to Ormuz by water, and reached Venice in 1295, with many diamonds, rubies, etc. of great value. Marco commanded a galley in a battle against the Genoese, by whom he was taken prisoner. During his long captivity he composed a narrative of his adventures, by the aid of notes which he had written previously. It is said that a French version of his book was made under his direction. His narrative produced a great sensation, and was translated into many languages, but for several ages was regarded as a tissue of fictions or gross exaggerations. The researches and revelations of successive centuries have more and more confirmed his veracity; and it is now recognized that his services had great influence on the progress of navigation and commerce. "When in the long series of ages," says M. Walckenaer, "we search for three men who by the grandeur and influence of their discoveries have contributed most to the progress of geography or of our knowledge of the globe, the modest name of the Venetian traveller presents itself in the same line with the names of Alexander the Great and Christopher Columbus." He died about 1324. Among the best editions of his book is that of Baldelli, "Il Milione di Messer Marco Polo," (4 vols., 1827.) An English version, by Marsden, was published in 1818.

See Placido Zurla, "Di M. Polo e degli altri antichi Viaggiatori," etc., 1818; Stein, "Ueber den Venetianer M. Polo," 1821; G. B. Baldelli, "Vita di M. Polo," 1827; G. Pauthier, article "Polo," in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Polonceau, po'lôn'sō', (Antoine Rémi,) a French engineer, born at Rheims in 1778. As engineer-in-chief of the department of Mont Blanc, he constructed a road over Mont Cenis about 1812. Among his works is the Pont du Carrousel at Paris, (1834.) He wrote several professional works. Died in 1847. His son, Jean Barthélemy Camille, (1813–59,) was distinguished as a railway engineer and director.

Poltrot de Meré, pol'trō' dẹh mẹh-rà', (Jean,) a French fanatic, who assassinated Francis, Duke de Guise, in 1563. He was executed the same year.

Polus. See Pole.

Pō'lus, a Sophist of Agrigentum, lived about 400 B.C., and was a disciple of Gorgias. He wrote a work on rhetoric.

Polus, (Matthew.) See Poole.

Polwhele, pol'wheel, (Rev. Richard,) an English antiquary and poet, born at Truro in 1759 or 1760. Among his works is a "History of Cornwall." Died in 1838.

Polyænus, pol-e-ee'nus, [Πολύαινος,] of Lampsacus, was an eminent mathematician; but, having become a friend and disciple of Epicurus, he renounced geometry, as unworthy of his notice.

Polyænus, a Macedonian writer, who lived about 150 A.D. He wrote a work on "Stratagems in War," which he dedicated to Marcus Aurelius and Verus. It is extant, and is prized for the numerous anecdotes and facts which he has collected, and which are not found elsewhere.

Polybe. See Polybius.

Polybius. See Polybus.

Po-lȳb'ĭ-us, [Gr. Πολύβιος; Fr. Polybe, po'lèb'; It. Polibio, po-lee'be-o,] a celebrated Greek historian, born at Megalopolis, in Arcadia, about 206 B.C. He was a son of Lycortas, who succeeded his friend Philopœmen as general of the Achæan League in 182 B.C. Polybius obtained in 169 B.C. command of the cavalry raised to fight for the Romans against Perseus; but his services were declined by the Roman general. In 167 the Romans transported to Italy, as hostages or exiles, one thousand Achæans, among whom was Polybius. He found a home in the house of Paulus Æmilius, and became the preceptor of his son Scipio, afterwards the famous Scipio Africanus the younger. A warm friendship was formed between this pupil and Polybius, who accompanied him in all his campaigns. He witnessed the conquest and destruction of Carthage, (146 B.C.,) soon after which he went to Greece and exerted his influence with some success to procure favourable terms for the conquered Achæans. He afterwards devoted himself to the completion of a general history, for which he had been preparing himself for some years by studies and by journeys to Egypt, Spain, Gaul, etc. The exact date of his death is unknown. Lucian states that he died at the age of eighty-two. His great work, entitled Καθολικὴ, κοινὴ ἱστορία, ("Universal History,") comprised the period from 220 to 146 B.C., and consisted of forty books, the greater part of which are lost. We have the first five books entire, and many fragments and extracts of several other books. His impartiality, his love of truth, his sound judgment and experience in military and civil affairs, render this one of the most valuable and reliable histories that have ever been written by an uninspired writer. He is thus briefly characterized by Cicero: "Polybius bonus auctor in primis." Livy's account of events after the second Punic war appears to be much like a translation from Polybius. The latter despised or neglected rhetorical ornaments, and was deficient in imagination. His style, consequently, is not attractive. He aimed only to instruct, and, according to some critics, carried too far his didactic and moralizing tendency. He wrote, also, a "Life of Philopœmen," and a "Treatise on Tactics." "Polybius and Arrian," says Macaulay, "have given us authentic accounts of facts; and here their merit ends. They were not men of comprehensive minds; they had not the art of telling a story in an interesting manner." ("Essay on History," 1828.) An English version of Polybius, by Hampton, (1772,) is commended.

Pol'ȳ-bus, [Gr. Πόλυβος; Fr. Polybe, po'lèb',] a king of Corinth, who was said to have educated or adopted Œdipus.

Polybus [Πόλυβος] or Polybius, a pupil and son-in-law of Hippocrates, lived in the island of Cos about 400 B.C. He was one of the founders of the sect of Dogmatici. Several treatises usually printed with the works of Hippocrates are ascribed to Polybus by many critics.

Pol'ȳ-carp, [Gr. Πολύκαρπος; Lat. Polycar'pus; Fr. Polycarpe, po'le'kȧrp',] an eminent martyr and Father of the Christian Church, of whose early history we have no authentic record. Irenæus states that Polycarp had intercourse with John and others of the apostles, and was appointed Bishop of Smyrna by the apostles. According to some writers, he was ordained by Saint John. He was Bishop of Smyrna when Ignatius of Antioch passed through that city on his way to Rome, which occurred between 107 and 116 A.D. Polycarp visited Rome in his old age, and had a conference with Anicetus, the Bishop of Rome, who differed from the Eastern churches in relation to the time or the observance of Easter. He suffered martyrdom by fire at Smyrna about 166 A.D. A letter from the church of Smyrna on the subject of his death is still extant. The only work of Polycarp that remains is a short Epistle to the Philippians, which is prized because numerous passages of the New Testament are quoted in it.

Polycarpe or Polycarpus. See Polycarp.

Pol-ȳ-char'mus, [Πολύχαρμος,] a Greek sculptor of unknown date. Pliny mentions his statue of "Venus washing herself," which was at Rome in his time.

Polycleitus. See Polycletus.

Pol'ȳ-clēs, [Πολυκλῆς,] a Greek sculptor, who lived about 370 B.C., was probably an Athenian. He is mentioned by Pliny, who says he made a celebrated statue of a hermaphrodite.

Another sculptor named Polycles is mentioned by Pliny as flourishing about 155 B.C. Pausanias notices some works of Polycles; but it is doubtful which of these two he refers to.

Polyclète. See Polycletus.

Pol-ȳ-cle'tus or Pol-y-clī'tus, [Gr. Πολύκλειτος; Fr. Polyclète, po'le'klȧt',] a Greek statuary of great celebrity, was also a sculptor and architect. He was a native of Sicyon or Argos, and was a pupil of Ageladas, the Argive statuary, who was at the same time the master of Phidias. The works of Polycletus were probably executed between 452 and 412 B.C. He surpassed all statuaries of his time except Phidias, and equalled the latter in beauty if not in sublimity. He once gained the first prize for a statue of an Amazon, in competition with Phidias and other artists. His master-pieces in bronze were a statue of a young man called "Diadumenos" binding his head with a fillet, "Doryphorus the Spear-Bearer," the Amazon noticed above, and a statue called the Κανών, ("Canon,") because it was recognized as a perfect model of the human figure. Some critics maintain that this last statue was the "Doryphorus." None of his works was more celebrated than a colossal ivory and gold statue of Juno, which adorned a temple near Argos. He was architect of a theatre at Epidaurus, which was, according to Pausanias, the most beautiful in the world. Cicero and Pliny agree in the opinion that Polycletus brought the art of statuary to perfection. Among his pupils were Aristides, Canachus, Athenodorus, and Phrynon.

See PLINY, "Natural History;" ÉMERIC DAVID, "Vies des Artistes anciens et modernes;" K. O. MÜLLER, "Handbuch der Archäologie der Kunst."

Polycletus, another statuary of Argos, is mentioned by Pausanias as a different person from him "who made the statue of Juno," and as a pupil of Naucydes, (who flourished about 410 B.C.) Several works are variously attributed to this Polycletus and to his more celebrated namesake.

Polycletus OF LARISSA, a Greek historian of unknown date. He wrote a history of Alexander the Great, which is not extant.

Polycrate. See POLYCRATES

Po-lȳc'ra-tēs, [Gr. Πολυκράτης; Fr. POLYCRATE, po'le'krăt',] tyrant of Samos, usurped the royal power about 532 B.C. He formed a powerful navy, and conquered some other islands. He patronized literature and the arts, and constructed some grand public works. His court was the resort of eminent artists and poets, among whom was Anacreon. He defended Samos with success against an attack of the Spartans and Corinthians. In 522 B.C. he was induced to go to Sardis by the satrap Orœtes, who treacherously put him to death.

See HERODOTUS, "History," book iii.; VEEGENS, "Dissertatio historica de Polycrate Samio," 1839. For a popular legend respecting Polycrates, see SCHILLER'S poem entitled "Der Ring des Polykrates."

Polycrates, an Athenian orator and Sophist, who was a contemporary of Socrates. He taught at Athens and Cyprus.

Pol-ȳ-dec'tēs, [Πολυδέκτης,] a Greek sculptor, who worked at Rome in the first century after Christ.

Polydeuces. See POLLUX.

Polydore. See POLYDORUS.

Polydore Vergil. See VERGIL.

Pol-ȳ-do'rus, [Gr. Πολύδωρος; Fr. POLYDORE, po'le'dor',] a son of Cadmus and Harmonia, was King of Thebes, and the father of Labdacus.

Polydorus, [Eng. POLYDORE, pol'ę-dōr,] the youngest son of Priam, was, according to the ancient poets, committed to the care of Polymestor, King of Thrace, by his father, who sent with him a large sum of money. Polymestor killed the young prince and appropriated the money.

Polydorus, a king of Sparta, was a son of Alcamenes, and the father of Eurycrates. He lived about 725 B.C.

Polydorus, a sculptor of Rhodes, aided Agesander (who is supposed to have been his father) in the execution of the famous group of Laocoon. He is mentioned by Pliny.

Pol-ȳ-eū'cus, [Gr. Πολύευκτος; Fr. POLYEUCTE, po'le'ukt',] an Athenian orator, lived about 325 B.C. He was a political friend of Demosthenes, and an adversary of Phocion.

Polygnote. See POLYGNOTUS.

Pol-ȳg-no'tus, [Gr. Πολύγνωτος; Fr. POLYGNOTE, po'lėg'not'; Ger. POLYGNOTOS, po-lig-no'tos,] an excellent Greek painter, born in the island of Thasos, was a son and pupil of Aglaophon. He flourished from about 460 to 430 B.C., was a contemporary of Phidias, and was a brother of the painter Aristophon. He became a citizen of Athens and a friend of Cimon, who employed him to ornament the temple of Theseus. He painted gratuitously the Pœcile or portico of Athens. After the death of Cimon (449 B.C.) Polygnotus probably retired from Athens, and applied himself to the decoration of the great temple at Delphi. He is styled "the Homer of painting," because he treated his subjects in an epic rather than a dramatic spirit. Pliny represents him as the first who painted women with transparent or shining drapery, (lucida veste,) and the first who contributed much to the progress of the art. He had imagination in the highest degree. In allusion to the ideal character and moral expression of his works, Aristotle calls him an ethic painter. The same critic says, in another passage, Polygnotus represented men better than they are, (or superior to nature.) Died about 426 B.C. Among his works were the "Marriage of the Daughters of Leucippus," the "Capture of Troy," and the "Visit of Ulysses to the Lower World."

Pol-ȳ-his'tor, [Πολυΐστωρ,] (ALEXANDER, or ALEXANDER CORNELIUS,) a Greek geographer and historian, born in Phrygia or Miletus, lived at Rome about 80 B.C. He was surnamed POLYHISTOR on account of his great learning, and is often quoted by Pliny the Elder. He wrote a description of many countries, in forty books. None of his works are extant.

Polyide. See POLYIDUS.

Pol-ȳ-hȳm'nĭ-ą or Po-lȳm'nĭ-ą, [from πολύς, "much," or "many," and ὕμνος, a "hymn," or "song,"] the name of the muse who presided over singing and rhetoric, and was supposed to be the inventress of harmony.

Pol-ȳ-ī'dus, [Gr. Πολύϊδος; Fr. POLYIDE, po'le'ėd',] a soothsayer of classic mythology, who was fabled to have restored to life Glaucus, a son of Minos. This story was a favourite subject of ancient poets and artists.

Polyidus, [Πολύϊδος,] an Athenian poet, musician, and painter, lived about 400 B.C. His productions (dithyrambs) were very popular.

Pol-ȳ-mes'tor or Pol-ym-nes'tor, a fabulous king of Thrace, was said to have been a son-in-law of Priam. He murdered POLYDORUS, which see. His story is related with much variation by different writers, some of whom say that he killed his own son by mistake instead of Polydorus.

Pol-ȳm-nes'tus [Πολύμνηστος] or Pol-ȳm-nas'tus OF COLOPHON, an epic and lyric poet, and musician, lived about 660 B.C.

Polynice. See POLYNICES.

Pol-ȳ-nī'cēs or Pol-ȳ-nei'cēs, [Gr. Πολυνείκης; Fr. POLYNICE, po'le'nèss',] a son of Œdipus, King of Thebes, and Jocasta. He made an agreement with his brother Eteocles that they should each reign one year alternately. Eteocles, having reigned the first year, refused to resign the throne. The cause of Polynices was espoused by Adrastus, King of Argos, who led the famous expedition against Thebes. Polynices and Eteocles killed each other in single combat.

See SOPHOCLES, "Œdipus et Colonus;" EURIPIDES, "Phœnissæ."

Polyphème. See POLYPHEMUS.

Pol-ȳ-phe'mus, [Gr. Πολύφημος; Fr. POLYPHÈME, po'le'fąm',] a Cyclops or giant of Sicily, who was said to have one eye in his forehead, and was called a son of Neptune. Homer relates in the "Odyssey" a famous adventure of Ulysses in the cave of Polyphemus. (See, also, Virgil's "Æneid," book iii. 617–676.)

Pol-ȳs-pęr'chon, [Gr. Πολυσπέρχων,] a Macedonian general, who in 332 B.C. obtained command of a division in the phalanx of Alexander. He served in the campaign of India, and was second in command of a body of veterans which Craterus conducted home in 323 B.C. During the absence of the regent Antipater in 321, he had the chief command in Macedonia and Greece. He became regent in 319 B.C., at the death of Antipater, who designated him as his successor. A coalition was formed against him by Antigonus and Cassander, who expelled him from Macedonia in 316 B.C. In 310 he raised an army to obtain the crown for Heracles, (a son of Alexander and Barsina,) but, having been corrupted by Cassander, he procured the assassination of that youth. Died after 303 B.C.

Polystrate. See POLYSTRATUS.

Po-lȳs'tra-tus, [Gr. Πολύστρατος; Fr. POLYSTRATE, po'lè'străt',] a Greek Epicurean philosopher, who succeeded Hermarchus as the head of the school. He lived probably about 250 B.C.

Po-lȳx'e-ną, [Gr. Πολυξένη; Fr. POLYXÈNE, po'lèk'sąn',] a daughter of Priam, King of Troy, was beloved by Achilles. According to one tradition, she was sacrificed by the Greeks on the tomb of Achilles.

Polyxène. See POLYXENA.

Pomarancio, po-mȧ-rȧn'cho, the surname of NICCOLÒ CIRCIGNANI, (chĕR-chĕn-yȧ'nee,) an Italian painter, born at Pomarancio, near Volterra. He worked in Rome, and aided Titian in the Belvedere of the Vatican. One of bis latest works is dated 1591.

Pomare, po-mä′rà, (AIMATA,) Queen of Tahiti, was born about 1822. Several chiefs having in 1842 placed the island under the protection of France, she protested against the act. The French admiral Du Petit-Thouars attempted to depose her by force, but his act was disavowed by the French court. She abdicated in favour of her son, Tamatoa, in 1852.

Pomarius, po-mā′re-ŭs, the Latin name of SAMUEL BAUMGARTEN, (bŏwm′gar′tĕn,) a German Protestant minister and writer, born in 1624; died in 1683.

Pombal, de, dà pom-bâl′ or pôn-bâl′, (Dom SEBASTIÃO JOZÉ de Carvalho—dà kar-vâl′yo,) MARQUIS, Count of Oeyras, an eminent Portuguese statesman, born at Soura, near Coimbra, in 1699. He studied law at Coimbra, and was sent as envoy-extraordinary to London in 1739. He married a niece of the Austrian general Daun, who gained the favour of the Queen of Portugal. By her influence Carvalho became minister of foreign affairs in 1750. He greatly increased the prosperity of Portugal, by the promotion of education, manufactures, commerce, etc. He reduced the power of the Inquisition, and banished the Jesuits in 1759. His administrative talents appear to have been of a high order. In 1770 he received the title of Marquis de Pombal. His reforms and his severity towards some of the nobility, who were suspected of complicity in a plot against the king's life, rendered him unpopular. He was deprived of power at the death of Joseph I., in 1777. Died in 1782.

Pomeranus. See BUGENHAGEN.

Pom′eroy, (MARCUS MILLS,) an American journalist, born at Elmira, New York, in 1833. He founded a number of newspapers, and came to be known as Brick Pomeroy, from his "Brickdust Sketches." During part of the war he strongly denounced the policy of the government. In 1876 he started a Greenback organ. His latest scheme was to tunnel the Rocky Mountains, in which he failed after much work had been done. Died in 1896.

Pomey, po′mȧ′, (FRANÇOIS ANNE,) a French Jesuit and classical teacher, born at Pernes in 1619. He published a work on mythology, "Mythological Pantheon," (1659,) and other works. Died in 1673.

Pŏm′fret, (JOHN,) an English poet, born in Bedfordshire in 1667, became rector of Malden. He wrote, besides other poems, "The Choice," which was once popular. "He pleases many," says Dr. Johnson; "and he who pleases many must have merit." Died in 1703.

Pommayrac, de, dẹh po′mȧ′rȧk′, (PIERRE PAUL,) a French painter of miniatures, was born in Porto-Rico about 1818. He worked in Paris, and obtained a medal of the first class in 1842. Died July 10, 1880.

Pommer, pom′mẹr, (CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH,) a German physician, born in 1787; died in 1841.

Pommeraye, pom′rȧ′, (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a French monk, born at Rouen in 1617. He wrote a "History of the Archbishops of Rouen," (1667.) Died in 1687.

Pommereul, de, dẹh pom′rŭl′, (FRANÇOIS RENÉ JEAN,) BARON, a French general and politician, born in Bretagne in 1745; died in 1823.

Pommier, po′me-ȧ′, (VICTOR LOUIS AMÉDÉE,) a French poet, was born at Lyons in 1804. He obtained several prizes of the French Academy for poems on the "Discovery of Steam Power," (1845,) and other subjects. He published "Poésies," (1832,) "Océanides et Fantaisies," (1839,) and other collections. Died at Paris, April 15, 1877.

Po-mo′na, [Fr. POMONE, po′mon′; from pomum, an "apple,"] a Roman divinity supposed to preside over the fruit which grows on trees.

Pompadour, de, dẹh pôn′pȧ′door′, (Madame JEANNE ANTOINETTE POISSON,) MARQUISE, was born in Paris in 1721. She was married in 1741 to M. d'Étioles, a publican. About 1744 her beauty and accomplishments attracted the favour of Louis XV., who gave her the title of Marquise de Pompadour in 1745. She retained a dominant influence over him until her death, in 1764. She appointed ministers and generals, received ambassadors, and maintained correspondence with foreign courts. Among her diplomatic acts was the coalition of France with Austria against Frederick the Great, in 1756.

Pompei, pom-pā′ee, (GIROLAMO,) an Italian Hellenist and translator, born at Verona in 1731. He produced some successful verses, entitled "Pastoral Songs," ("Canzoni pastorali," 1766,) and several tragedies. His reputation is founded chiefly on an Italian translation of Plutarch's "Lives," (1772,) which is the best in that language, and probably equal to the best version in any language. Died at Verona in 1788.

Pompeius, (CNEIUS.) See POMPEY THE GREAT.

Pom-pe′ius, (QUINTUS,) a Roman general and orator was consul in 141 B.C. He commanded in Spain in 140, and was defeated. In 131 B.C. he was elected censor.

Pompeius, (RUFUS Q.,) a son or grandson of the preceding, was tribune of the people in 100 B.C., and prætor in 91. He became consul with L. Sulla in 88 B.C., and was a partisan of Sulla in the civil war. He was killed by his mutinous soldiers in 88 or 87 B.C.

Pompeius Magnus. See POMPEY THE GREAT.

Pom-pe′ius Strā′bo, (CNEIUS,) an able Roman general, was the father of Pompey the triumvir. He gained several victories in the Social war, and was a partisan of the aristocracy in the civil war between Sulla and Marius. His avarice and cruelty rendered him odious. He was killed by lightning in 87 B.C.

Pompeius Trogus. See TROGUS.

Pompeo. See POMPEY.

Pom′pey, [Lat. POMPE′IUS; Fr. POMPÉE, pôn′pā′; It. POMPEO, pom-pā′o,] (CNEIUS,) the eldest son of Pompey the Great, was born about 78 B.C. His mother was Mucia. He commanded a fleet for his father in 48 B.C., and after the death of the latter sailed to Spain, where he raised an army of thirteen legions. In 45 B.C. this army encountered at Munda another, commanded by Cæsar in person, who gained a complete but not an easy victory. Pompey was overtaken in his retreat and killed.

Pompey, (Pompeius,) (SEXTUS,) a son of the triumvir, was born in 75 B.C. He waged war with some success against Cæsar in Spain after the battle of Munda. Soon after the death of Cæsar (44 B.C.) he was appointed chief admiral of the fleet by the senate; but he was proscribed as an outlaw by Antony and Octavius. He made himself master of Sicily, and, by means of his formidable fleet, obstructed the supply of corn which the Romans received by sea. The officers of Sextus gained several victories over the fleet of Octavius. In 36 B.C. Agrippa defeated Pompey, who fled to Asia and was put to death in 35 B.C. by the officers of Antony.

See APPIAN, "Bellum Civile."

Pompey the Great, [Lat. POMPE′IUS MAG′NUS, Fr. POMPÉE LE GRAND, pôn′pā′ lẹh grôn,] (CNEIUS,) a famous Roman general and triumvir, was born on the 30th of September, 106 B.C., in the same year as Cicero. He fought under his father in the Social war, (89 B.C.,) and saved his father's life when Cinna attempted to assassinate him in 87 B.C. He raised, without a commission, three legions to fight for Sulla against the party of Marius in 83 B.C., and began to display his great military talents in the defeat of a hostile force under Brutus. For this success Sulla saluted him with the title of imperator. He gained another victory over the legates of Carbo in 82 B.C., reduced Numidia in 81, and obtained the honour of a triumph, although he was but a simple eques.

In 76 B.C. he obtained command of an army sent to Spain against Sertorius, who defeated Pompey in two battles, but was assassinated in the year 72, soon after which Spain was reduced to subjection. With a high degree of popularity, Pompey returned to Italy in 71 B.C., and was elected consul (with Crassus) for the year 70, although he had not held any of the lower civil offices and was not legally eligible for other reasons. Among the important acts of his administration was the restoration of the power of the tribunes, by which he signalized his defection from the aristocratic party. He remained at Rome inactive during 69 and 68 B.C. In the next year his friends procured the passage of a law by which he was selected to conduct a war against the pirates (who infested the Mediterranean in great numbers) and was invested with irresponsible power for three years. He performed this service with complete success in less than one year, and, it is said, took 20,000 prisoners.

The next enterprise to which he was called by his own ambition and the favour of the people was the termination of the Mithridatic war, which had been protracted for years. His claims having been advocated by Cicero in a long oration, ("Pro Lege Manilia,") he superseded Lucullus in 66 B.C. He defeated Mithridates in Lesser Armenia in the same year, and after that king had escaped to the Crimea, which was difficult of access to the Roman army, Pompey turned southward, and reduced Syria to a Roman province in 64 B.C. After a siege of three months, he captured Jerusalem in 63, and entered the sanctuary of the Temple. Having received intelligence of the death of Mithridates, and having reduced Pontus and Bithynia to subjection, he returned to Italy in 62 B.C., and was received with general enthusiasm. The triumph which he obtained on this occasion was the most brilliant which the Romans had ever witnessed. Offended by the refusal of the senate to sanction his public acts in Asia, he identified himself with the popular party, and formed with Cæsar and Crassus a coalition or triumvirate, (59 B.C.) Pompey, having divorced Mucia, his third wife, married Julia, a daughter of Cæsar. He made no effort to prevent the banishment of Cicero, but he supported the bill for his restoration, in 57 B.C. His popularity was now on the decline. He had lost the confidence of the senate by his coalition with Cæsar, who was his successful rival in respect to the favour of the people. Pompey could only obtain the consulship in 55 B.C. by the aid of Cæsar, with whom he and Crassus had formed another secret treaty or bargain.

Anticipating the open hostility of Cæsar to his ambitious projects, Pompey renewed his connection with the aristocracy, who accepted him as their leader in 51 B.C. About the end of the next year the friends of Pompey obtained a decree of the senate that Cæsar should disband his army. In defiance of this decree, Cæsar marched to Rome with a force which Pompey was unable to resist. His self-confidence was such that he had neglected to levy troops, and he was compelled to retreat to Epirus, where he collected an army. (See CÆSAR.) Urged on by the civilians and nobles of his camp, against his own judgment he offered battle to Cæsar in the plain of Pharsalia in August, 48 B.C. and was completely defeated. He escaped by sea, with his wife Cornelia, and sought refuge in Egypt, but was murdered in the act of landing, by order of Theodotus and Achillas, the chief ministers, in September, 48 B.C. His moral character is represented as better than that of the majority of Roman generals in his time. He was deficient in political abilities, and was guided by no fixed principles as a statesman.

He was for a time major of volunteers in the war of 1861–65, and for many years was clerk of printing records in Washington. Among his works are "Materials for American History in the French Archives," (1848,) "The Rise and Fall of Louis Philippe," (1848,) "Early Life of Napoleon," (1851,) "Federal and State Charters," (2 vols., 1877,) "Life of General Burnside," (1882,) and several novels. He edited the annual Abridgment of the United States Public Documents for many years, and prepared and published an annual "Congressional Directory," (1864 et seq.) Died May 29, 1887.

Pooshkin, Pushkin, Pouchekine, Puschkin, or Pouschkin, poosh'kin or poosh'kĕn, (ALEXANDER SERGEIVITCH,) a celebrated Russian poet, born at Saint Petersburg in 1799. Having published several poems of a too liberal tendency, he was banished to Odessa, where he held an office under the governor-general, Count Vorontsof. During his presence in Southern Russia he studied the Spanish and Italian languages, and the works of Byron, upon whose model he may be said to have formed himself. His first considerable poem, entitled "Ruslan and Liudmila," (1821,) was very well received; it was followed by the "Prisoner of the Caucasus," ("Plennik Kavkaskoi," 1822,) "The Fountain of Bakhtchisarai," (1824,) which brought him three thousand rubles, "Eugene Onegin," a metrical romance, the "Gypsies," ("Tsigani,") and the narrative poem of "Poltava." After the accession of Nicholas, Pooshkin was recalled to Moscow and appointed historiographer.

His only historical production is an account of Poogatchef's rebellion. Besides the above, he published "Boris Godoonof," a dramatic poem, esteemed one of his master-pieces, and a "History of the Iron Mask." He was mortally wounded in a duel in 1837. A critic in "Blackwood's Magazine" calls him "one of that small but illustrious band whose writings have become part of the very household language of their native land, and whose expressions may be said, like those of Shakspeare, of Molière, and of Cervantes, to have become the natural forms embodying the ideas which they have expressed, and, in expressing, consecrated. In a word, Pooshkin is undeniably and essentially the great national poet of Russia."

Pōpe, (ALEXANDER,) a popular English poet and critic, born in London on the 22d of May, 1688, was a son of a linen-draper. His parents were Roman Catholics. In consequence of his sickly constitution and deformed person, he was unfitted for active life. During his childhood he resolved to be a poet. His precocity was remarkable. He says himself that he began to write verses farther back than he could well remember. At the age of eight he read with interest Ogilby's translation of Homer. He wrote his "Pastorals" at the age of sixteen; but they were not published until 1709. Among his early productions are the "Essay on Criticism," (1710,) which was praised by Addison, and "The Rape of the Lock," (1711,) a mock-heroic poem, which was much admired. His "Messiah," an exquisite poem in imitation of Virgil's fourth eclogue, appeared in Addison's "Spectator" in 1712. In 1713 he issued proposals for a subscription to a translation of Homer's "Iliad," which was completed in 1718–20 and obtained a great popularity. It is, however, far from being a faithful translation. "It is a fine poem," says Bentley, "but not Homer." About 1715 he became estranged from Addison, whom he accused of conspiring with Tickell, who had produced (in part) a rival translation of the "Iliad." Pope revenged himself by writing the keen, not to say malicious, satire on "Atticus." "He was," says Macaulay, "a great master of invective and sarcasm. He could dissect a character in terse and sonorous couplets brilliant with antithesis." ("Essay on the Life and Writings of Addison.") His talent for satire is conspicuous in the "Dunciad," (1728,) a poetical work of much critical merit. He published in 1733 his "Essay on Man," a philosophic poem, which has enjoyed an extraordinary popularity, and which Bulwer pronounces "unequalled in didactic solemnity and splendour since Lucretius set to music the false creed of Epicurus." With the aid of Broome and Fenton, he translated the "Odyssey," (1725.) He also produced admirable "Imitations of Horace." He wrote, in prose, a number of essays and letters, the style of which is considered excellent. "Pope's epistolary excellence," says Dr. Johnson, "had an open field: he had no English rival, living or dead." In the latter part of his life he lived at Twickenham, where he had purchased a house. He favoured the Tory party and the Roman Catholic Church. Among his intimate friends were Swift, Atterbury, and Lord Bolingbroke. Died in May, 1744. He possessed little originality or creative imagination; but he had a vivid sense of the beautiful, and an exquisite taste. He owed much of his popularity to the easy harmony of his verse, the keenness of his satire, and the brilliancy of his antithesis.

"The Essay on Man," says Dr. Johnson, "affords an egregious instance of the predominance of genius, the dazzling splendour of imagery, and the seductive powers of eloquence. Never was penury of knowledge and vulgarity of sentiment so happily disguised. The reader feels his mind full, though he learns nothing, and, when he meets it in its new array, no longer knows the talk of his mother and his nurse." The same critic pronounces the "Rape of the Lock" "the most airy, ingenious, and delightful of his compositions, and the most exquisite example of ludicrous poetry. . . . He was sometimes wanton in his attacks, and before Chandos, Lady Wortley, and Hill, was mean in his retreat. His malignity to Philips, whom he had first made ridiculous and then hated for being angry, continued too long." He was extremely addicted to artifice and insidious designs. It has been said that "he hardly drank tea without a stratagem." An edition of his works, with a commentary, was published by Warburton, (9 vols., 1751–60.)

Pōpe, (JOHN,) an American general, born in Louisville, Kentucky, March 16, 1822. He graduated at West Point in 1842, served in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) and commanded an expedition sent to survey the route of the Pacific Railroad in 1854–59. He obtained the rank of captain in 1856, and became a brigadier-general of volunteers in May, 1861. He captured New Madrid in March, and Island No. 10 in April, 1862, with several thousand prisoners. In June, 1862, he was appointed commander of the Army of Virginia, composed of three corps. He was promoted to be a brigadier-general in the regular army in July, 1862. His army was defeated by Stonewall Jackson at Manassas, or Bull Run, on the 29th and 30th of August, 1862. He retreated to Washington, and resigned the command, after which, until 1865, he was employed against the Indians in Minnesota. He subsequently had command, successively, of several military departments until his retirement, March 16, 1886. Died September 23, 1892.

Porphyry, por'fe-re, [Gr. Πορφύριος; Lat. PORPHYRIUS; Fr. PORPHYRE, por'fêr'; It. PORFIRIO, por-fee're-o,] a celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher, born at Batanæa, (Bashan,) in Syria, in 233 A.D. His original name was MALCHUS or MELECH, the Hebrew and Syriac for "king." Porphyrius signifies "purple," or "wearer of purple." He was a pupil of Longinus, and perhaps of Origen. About the age of thirty he went to Rome, where he became a disciple and friend of Plotinus, whose doctrines and mysticism he adopted. He edited (or corrected) and arranged the works of Plotinus, at his request. He wrote (in Greek) a famous work, in fifteen books, against the Christians, which is not extant, the emperor Theodosius having ordered it to be burnt in the fourth century. Among his extant works are a "Life of Plotinus" and a "Life of Pythagoras." Died at Rome about 304 A.D.

Por'se-na or Por-sen'na, (LARS,) a famous prince of Clusium, in Etruria. According to tradition, he marched against Rome to restore the Tarquins about 508 B.C., but was checked by Horatius Cocles, who defended a bridge over the Tiber. It is the opinion of the best historians that Porsena actually made himself master of Rome.

Porsenna. See PORSENA.

Por'son, (RICHARD,) a pre-eminent Greek scholar and critic, born in Norfolk, England, December 25, 1759. He was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a Fellow in 1782. He became regius professor of Greek at Cambridge in 1790 or 1792, with a salary of forty pounds per annum. His scruples against subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles induced him to decline holy orders, and he was compelled to resign his Fellowship in 1791. He had a prodigious memory and great critical acumen, and was remarkable for probity and love of truth. About 1795 he married Mrs. Lunan, a widow. He edited "Seven Tragedies of Æschylus," (1795,) and the "Hecuba," "Orestes," "Phœnissæ," and "Medea" of Euripides, (1797–1801.) In 1805 he was appointed librarian of the London Institution. Among his works are "Letters to Archdeacon Travis," (1790,) in which he maintained that the seventh verse of the fifth chapter of John's First Epistle is an interpolation, "Notes and Emendations on the Greek Poets," ("Adversaria Notæ et Emendationes in Poetas Græcos," 1812,) and an edition of the "Lexicon" of Photius, (1822.) Died in London in September, 1808. He is considered by the English scholars, and perhaps by foreigners, the greatest verbal critic of modern times. "It may safely be conceded to common fame and partial friendship," says Dr. Thomas Young, "that he was one of the greatest men, and the very greatest critic, of his own or any other age." Porson was, according to several authorities, addicted to intemperance in drink. Like Dr. Johnson, he could practise abstinence more easily than a moderate use of wine or ardent spirits. Wonderful stories are told of his powers of memory. He could repeat several pages of a book after he had read them once.

Pōr'tẹr, (ANNA MARIA,) an English novellst, born at Durham about 1781, was a sister of R. Ker Porter. She resided successively in London, at Thames Ditton, and at Esher. She wrote many popular novels, among which are "The Hungarian Brothers," (1807,) "Don Sebastian," (1809,) "The Recluse of Norway," (1814,) "The Fast of Saint Magdalene," and "The Barony." Died in 1832.

Porter, (DAVID,) an American commodore, born at Boston in 1780. He became captain of the frigate Essex in July, 1812, and in the same year captured the vessel-of-war Alert and a number of British trading-vessels. He performed a cruise in the Pacific Ocean with the Essex in 1813, and took many prizes. In March, 1814, the Essex was attacked near Valparaiso by two British vessels, and, after a long and desperate resistance, was captured. Porter served as a naval commissioner from 1815 to 1823, was sent as chargé-d'affaires to Turkey in 1831, and became minister resident at Constantinople in 1839. He died at Pera in 1843. He was the father of Admiral D. D. Porter and Commodore William D. Porter.

See the "Quarterly Review" for July, 1815.

Porter, (DAVID D.,) an admiral, a son of the preceding, was born in or near Philadelphia in June, 1813. He entered the navy as midshipman in 1829, and became a lieutenant about 1841. He served in the naval operations against the Mexicans in 1846–47. In 1861 he was promoted to the rank of commander. He commanded the mortar-boats, twenty-one in number, which bombarded Forts Jackson and Saint Philip, below New Orleans, April 18–24, 1862. These forts were surrendered to him on the 28th. In September or October, 1862, he took command of a flotilla of gunboats on the Mississippi River. He aided the land army in the capture of Arkansas Post, January, 1863, and co-operated with General Grant in his operations against Vicksburg. For his services in the reduction of the last-named place he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral by a commission dated July 4, 1863. Co-operating with General Banks in an expedition against Shreveport, he ascended Red River with a fleet of iron-clad gunboats to a point many miles above Grand Ecore, in April, 1864. He commanded the naval forces in the attack on Fort Fisher in December, 1864, and bombarded the same fort with success on the 14th and 15th of January, 1865. According to General Grant, this was "the most formidable armada ever collected for concentration upon one given point." He was appointed vice-admiral July 25, 1866, and admiral in August, 1870, a higher rank than was held by any other officer in the navy. Died Feb. 13, 1891.

Porter, (FITZ-JOHN,) an American general, born in New Hampshire, graduated at West Point in 1845. He became a captain in 1856, and a colonel in 1861. He commanded a corps at the battle of Gaines's Mill, June 27, and at Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862, and for his bravery in these engagements, in which he had to sustain the brunt of the enemy's attack, was appointed a major-general of volunteers the same month. His corps took no part in the battle of Bull Run, August 29 and 30, 1862, although it was "within sight and sound of the battle." For this delinquency he was censured by General Pope, tried by a court-martial, cashiered in January, 1863, and dismissed from the service. In 1870 he appealed to President Grant for a reversal of the decision of the court-martial. The charges were re-examined under President Hayes, and he was found not guilty. He was reinstated as colonel in 1886, and at once retired. He was police commissioner of New York 1884–88, fire commissioner 1889, and cashier of the post-office 1893–97.

Port-Royalists, a name popularly given to tbe members of the celebrated convent or society of Port-Royal-des-Champs, near Versailles. It fills a prominent place in the history of the Jansenist controversy. The nuns were removed to Paris about 1638, (or 1644, according to Hallam,) after which the old convent of Port-Royal-des-Champs became the residence of a community of religious and learned men, who practised some monastic austerities and were called "Les Solitaires de Port-Royal." Among these recluses were Claude Lancelot, Antoine Arnauld, Le Maistre de Sacy, Pierre Nicole, and Blaise Pascal. They were leaders of the Jansenist party. They opened a boarding-school which became celebrated, and published several good works on grammar. The convent of nuns was suppressed by Louis XIV. in 1709. The history of Port-Royal has been written by Racine, Reuchlin, Sainte-Beuve, and others.

Poussin, poo'săN', (NICOLAS,) an excellent French painter of history and landscapes, called "the Raphael of France," was born at or near Andelys, on the Seine, in Normandy, in 1594. He studied design with Quentin Varin, of Amiens, and at the age of eighteen went to Paris, where he received lessons from Ferdinand Elle. His early efforts were embarrassed by poverty. He made several attempts to visit Rome, which failed for want of funds. His long-cherished desire to see that metropolis of art was gratified in 1624. He there formed an intimacy with the sculptor F. Duquesnoy, and studied the works of Raphael with ardent admiration. He also made designs or models of antique statues and bas-reliefs. For Cardinal Barberini, who became his patron, he painted "The Death of Germanicus," and "The Capture of Jerusalem by Titus."

Poussin married in 1630 Anne Marie Dughet, a sister of the eminent painter Gaspard Dughet surnamed Poussin. Among the works which he painted (in oil) at Rome are a series of "The Seven Sacraments," "The Rape of the Sabine Women," "The Triumph of Flora," and "The Passage of the Red Sea." He had acquired a wide celebrity when, about the end of 1640, he returned to France at the request of the king, who appointed him his first painter. He painted for the king a beautiful altar-piece of "The Last Supper," but soon became disgusted with the intrigues of the court and the jealousy of rival artists. In 1642 he returned to Rome, where he remained until his death, November, 1665.

"With a laborious and mighty grasp," says Hazlitt, "he put Nature into the mould of the ideal and antique, and was among painters (more than any one else) what Milton was among poets. There is in both something of the same pedantry, the same stiffness, the same elevation, the same grandeur, the same mixture of art and nature, the same richness of borrowed materials, the same unity of character." ("Table-Talk.")

"His life," says Delacroix, "was reflected in his works, and accorded with the beauty and nobleness of his inventions." He is considered the greatest historical painter that France has produced. "Poussin has a far greater power," says Ruskin, "and his landscapes, though more limited in material, are incomparably nobler, than Claude's." The same critic calls him "the principal master of the classical landscape." ("Modern Painters.")

In 1803 he entered the service of Russia, and devoted himself to diplomacy, for which he was qualified by his penetration and address. He performed a mission to Vienna in 1804 or 1805, and another to Turkey in 1807. He regarded Napoleon as a personal enemy, and contributed to his overthrow. In 1813 he took a prominent part at the Congress of Frankfort, and composed the famous declaration of the allies. He acted as Russian commissioner with the army of the allies in 1815, and signed the treaty of Paris. He was Russian ambassador at Paris from 1815 to 1835. Died in 1842.

Pradel, de, dẹh prȧ′dĕl′, (PIERRE MARIE MICHEL COUTRAY,) a French poet and improvisateur, born in Paris in 1787. He produced many short poems. Died at Brussels in 1857.

Pradier, prȧ′de-ā′, (JACQUES,) a French sculptor of high reputation, was born at Geneva in 1792. He gained the grand prize of Rome (at Paris) in 1813, and studied at Rome for five years. He became a member of the Institute in 1827. His works are remarkable for softness and grace. His imagination was vivid, his design correct, his execution good; and with more elevation of style he would have raised himself to the highest rank of French sculptors. Among his best works are a "Psyche," (1824,) "The Three Graces," (1831,) a marble group of "Venus and Cupid," (1836,) and a marble statue of Sappho, (1852.) Died near Paris in 1852.

Prado, prȧ′dō, (MARIANO IGNACIO,) a Peruvian president, born at Huánuco in 1826, took part in the insurrection of 1854 which overthrew President Echenique, and in 1865 headed the revolution which deposed President Pezet. Prado was proclaimed dictator, and gained great renown by the repulse of the Spanish fleet from Callao, May 2, 1866. He was chosen president for six years, but was expelled by Balta in 1868, and retired to Chili, where he was made a general of division, and was subsequently Peruvian minister. Elected president a second time in 1876, he was in 1879 director of the Peruvian and Bolivian armies in the war against Chili. After severe reverses and the loss of the province of Tarapacá, he went to Europe in December, 1879, to seek aid, and in his absence was deposed from the presidency.

Prado, del, dĕl prȧ′dō, (BLAS,) a Spanish painter, born at Toledo in 1544, was patronized by Philip II. Died about 1605.

Pradon, prȧ′dôn′, (NICOLAS,) a mediocre French tragic poet, born at Rouen in 1632. He produced in 1674 "Pyramus and Thisbe," and attempted to rival Racine in "Phèdre et Hippolyte," (1677,) which was applauded by a certain party or cabale. Died in 1698.

Pradt, de, dẹh prȧt, (Abbé DOMINIQUE DUFOUR,) a French diplomatist and political writer, born in Auvergne in 1759. He became almoner of Napoleon about 1804, Bishop of Poitiers in 1805, and Archbishop of Malines in 1808. In 1812 he was sent as ambassador to Warsaw, and, according to some writers, incurred the displeasure of Napoleon, with whom he had a curious conversation during his retreat from Moscow. He published many political and historical works, among which is a "History of the Embassy to Warsaw," (1815.) Died in 1837.

Praed, prād, (ROSA CAROLINE,) an Australian novelist, was born (Prior) in Queensland, Australia, in 1851, and married Campbell Mackworth Praed in 1872. Among her novels are "An Australian Heroine," (1880,) "The Bond of Wedlock," (1887,) "December Roses," (1893,) "The Scourge Stick," (1898,) etc.

Praed, prād, (WINTHROP MACKWORTH,) an English poet and lawyer, born in London in 1802. He was the chief contributor to "The Etonian," a monthly paper issued in 1820; after which he entered Trinity College, Cambridge. He gained prizes for the Greek ode and epigram, and for English poems, entitled "Australia," (1823,) and "Athens," (1824.) In 1829 he was called to the bar. He was returned to Parliament about 1830, opposed the Reform bill, and was re-elected in 1835. He became a successful debater and a zealous conservative. Died in 1839. His poems are highly commended for wit and elegance.

Prăjâpăti, prą-jâ′pą-tĭ, [from the Sanscrit prâjâ, "people," or the "world," and pâti, "master,"] in the Hindoo mythology, a title given to certain divine personages, called also BRAHMÂDIKAS, among whom are Marichi, Bhrigu, Daksha, and Nârada.

Prax-iph'a-nēs, [Gr. Πραξιφάνης; Fr. PRAXIPHANE, prăks'e'fän',] a Greek philosopher, born at Mitylene, was a pupil of Theophrastus, and a teacher of Epicurus.

See PRELLER, "De Praxiphane," 1842.

Praxitèle. See PRAXITELES.

Prax-it'e-lēz, [Gr. Πραξιτέλης; Fr. PRAXITÈLE, prăks'e'tăl',] one of the greatest of Grecian sculptors, flourished about 360 B.C. The time and place of his birth are unknown. He was probably a contemporary of Apelles, and an Athenian. According to Pausanias, he lived three generations after Alcamenes. The name of his master has not been preserved. Praxiteles is regarded as the founder of a school, or the author of a new style of art. Ancient writers represent him as celebrated for refinement and softness of contour, grace in attitude, and delicacy in the expression of tender affections. Cicero considered the expression which animated the heads of Praxiteles as one of the most admirable and difficult results which human skill could attain. Among his best works in bronze were a statue of Bacchus, a Satyr or Faun, and a statue of Apollo, called "Sauroctonos." An ancient copy (in marble) of the last work is preserved in the Vatican. His master-piece was a marble statue of Venus (of Cnidos) without drapery, which was destroyed by fire at Constantinople about 475 A.D. No work of Grecian sculptors, except the Jupiter of Phidias, appears to have been so celebrated as this Venus of Cnidos. He produced also a statue of Venus draped, and a marble statue of Cupid, which was praised by Pliny. His statue of Hermes was in 1878 recovered from the ruins at Olympia. Of this statue the right arm is lost. It is justly regarded as one of the most precious relics of ancient art.

Pren'tiss, (BENJAMIN M.,) an American general, born in Wood county, Virginia, in 1819. He became a citizen of Illinois about 1842, and was appointed a brigadier-general in 1861. He was taken prisoner at Shiloh, April 6, 1862. About July 3, 1863, he defeated Generals Holmes and Price, who attacked him at Helena, Arkansas.

Prentiss, (ELIZABETH,) an American author, born at Portland, Maine, October 26, 1818, a daughter of Edward Payson, already noticed. In 1845 she was married to

Rev. G. L. Prentiss, a Congregationalist clergyman and a brother of Seargent S. Prentiss. Among her numerous works are "The Flower of the Family," (1856,) "Tales of Early Childhood," "The Little Preacher," (1869,) "Stepping Heavenward," (1869,) etc., mostly religious tales for the young. Died at Dorset, Vermont, August 13, 1878. "Stepping Heavenward" is the work by which she is best known.

Prentiss, (SEARGENT SMITH,) an American orator, born at Portland, Maine, in 1808. He studied law, and became about 1832 a resident of Vicksburg, Mississippi, where he practised with success. He was elected a member of Congress by the Whigs in 1837. In 1840 he advocated the election of General Harrison by several public speeches. He had a high reputation as an orator, and as an advocate in jury-trials was equal or superior to any lawyer in the Southwestern States. Died near Natchez in 1850.

Pres'cott, (GEORGE BARTLETT,) an American electrician, born at Kingston, New York, in 1830. He became an expert in telegraphy, and was the practical man in introducing Edison's duplex and quadruplex systems. Prescott, (OLIVER,) M.D., an American physician and patriot of the Revolution, born at Groton, Massachusetts, in 1731. He served as an officer in the Revolutionary war. Died in 1804.

Prescott, (WILLIAM,) COLONEL, an American officer of the Revolution, born at Groton, Massachusetts, in 1725, was a brother of Oliver, noticed above. He fought with distinguished bravery at the battle of Bunker Hill, where he appears to have had the chief command, and in other important engagements. Died in 1795.

Prescott, (WILLIAM,) LL.D., an American jurist, son of the preceding, was born at Pepperell in 1762. He was appointed in 1818 a judge of the court of common pleas. He enjoyed a high reputation for legal attainments. He was the father of William H. Prescott, the historian. Died in 1844.

Prescott, (WILLIAM HICKLING,) an eminent American historian, a son of the preceding, and grandson of Colonel Prescott who commanded at Bunker Hill, was born at Salem, Massachusetts, on the 4th of May, 1796. Both his parents were remarkable for their high moral qualities. His father was distinguished for his manly beauty, as well as for the dignity and gentleness of his character. His mother, originally Miss Catherine Greene Hickling, was a woman of great energy, vivacity, and active benevolence; and to her influence her son appears to have owed not only much of the happiness of his life, but also some of those admirable moral traits which formed the crowning ornament to his rare intellectual endowments. In the summer of 1808 his father removed to Boston, and the following autumn sent his son to what was then regarded as the best classical school in New England. It was kept by Dr. Gardiner, an excellent scholar, who had been educated in England under the celebrated Dr. Parr. In 1811 young Prescott entered the Sophomore class at Harvard College. In his knowledge of Greek and Latin he was far in advance of most of the members of his class; but he had no fondness for mathematics, and never attained any proficiency in mathematical studies. During his Junior year at college an accident befell him which was destined to influence the whole of his subsequent life. One day in the Commons Hall, while the students—as too often happened after the professors had left the table—were indulging in a rude frolic, Prescott rose to go out of the room, but, attracted by the tumult behind him, suddenly turned his head to see what it was. At that instant a hard piece of bread, thrown at random, struck him on his left eye, which, under the peculiar circumstances, having no warning, was open, so that nothing—not even the eyelid—was interposed to mitigate the blow. He instantly fell prostrate and powerless, as if the brain itself had received a severe concussion. After some weeks he was able to resume his studies; but the sight of his left eye—though this was to appearance unchanged—was gone forever.

This early misfortune, while it tended to check his somewhat exuberant vivacity, far from discouraging him in the pursuit of his studies, seemed to excite in him a more earnest and determined resolution to become a respectable scholar. He graduated in August, 1814, and soon after commenced the study of law. But the excessive use of his remaining eye induced a severe inflammation in the organ, followed by opacity of the cornea, so that for some weeks the power of vision was completely lost.

Among the many interesting and admirable traits in Mr. Prescott's character, perhaps none is more remarkable than the invincible cheerfulness and heroic resignation with which he bore the frequent and severe suffering and the life-long privations to which he was subjected in consequence of the injury of his sight.

In the hope of improving his general health, which had been seriously impaired by confinement, and also of indirectly benefiting his eyes, he was induced to undertake a voyage to Europe. He set out in the autumn of 1815. He remained abroad nearly two years, visiting England, France, and Italy. His sight, though not strong enough to permit him to read much, seems to have been sufficient to give him a vivid enjoyment of the various scenes and places through which he travelled; but his health appears not to have been benefited by his foreign tour, and in the summer of 1817 he returned to his native country. He now decided to abandon the law and devote himself wholly to literature. His eye, however, was so irritable and feeble that he was obliged to pass much of his time in a darkened room, with barely light enough to admit of some one reading to him,—this being now his only means of cultivating an acquaintance with his favourite authors.

In May, 1820, Mr. Prescott was married to Miss Susan Amory; and the union appears to have been a singularly happy one. About 1821 he commenced a systematic course of reading, (by the ear,) which was to embrace the works of the best English prose writers from Roger Ascham to the present day, and afterwards the best productions of the literatures of France and Italy. He appears to have enjoyed with a peculiar zest the great works of Italian genius, and especially the "Divina Commedia" of Dante. He seems to have taken less delight in the celebrated authors of France, though he admired Montaigne and Pascal, and, above all, La Fontaine and Molière. In the autumn of 1824 he commenced in earnest the study of that magnificent language and literature which have been immortalized by the genius of Lope de Vega and Cervantes. "This," says Mr. Ticknor, "was the opening of the Spanish campaign, which ended only with his life." He had at one time entertained the design of writing a sort of general history of Italian literature; but this was now abandoned for labour in a different field. After "long choosing," to adopt the words of Milton, "and beginning late," he at last decided, in January, 1826, to write the "History of Ferdinand and Isabella," which, eleven years later, was published, in three 8vo volumes, simultaneously in Boston and in London. The success of the work was of the most flattering kind, and at once placed him in the very highest rank of contemporary historians. After six years of additional labour, appeared his "Conquest of Mexico," (3 vols. 8vo, 1843.) Four years afterwards he gave the world his "Conquest of Peru," (2 vols. 8vo.) In 1845 appeared a volume of his "Miscellanies," consisting of contributions to the "North American Review." In 1850 he made a short visit to Europe. Soon after his return he commenced the "History of the Reign of Philip II. of Spain," a work which he did not live to complete, although the first three volumes were published in his lifetime, the first two having appeared in 1855, the third in 1858. The entire work was designed to be included in 6 vols. 8vo. The third volume was published in the summer of 1858, after the occurrence of his first slight apoplectic attack, (February 4, 1858,) from which he seemed speedily to recover. He resumed his literary labours, but was forced to limit himself to the lightest kind of work; and he never afterwards had that enjoyment in his studies which he had experienced in previous years. On the 28th of January, 1859, he was seized with a second attack of apoplexy, of which he died in about three hours.

In person Mr. Prescott was tall and well formed, with light-brown hair, a fine clear complexion, and an expression of countenance singularly bright, genial, and attractive. "His smile," says Mr. Ticknor, "was absolutely the most contagious I ever looked upon." His disposition was in the highest degree social, generous, and kindly. "Indeed, take him for all in all," says Mr. Ticknor, "I think no man ever walked our streets, as he did day by day, that attracted such regard and good will from so many; for, however few he might know, there were very many that knew him, and watched him with unspoken welcomes as he passed along."

Mr. Prescott's merits as a historian are of the very highest order. In vigour of thought and in grandeur of style he has undoubtedly been surpassed by many of the great masters of historical composition; but he possessed other qualities, which, if less imposing, are far more essential to the character of a perfect historian. In that spirit of thorough research which never rests satisfied until every field has been explored and every accessible source of information consulted and exhausted, he has had few if any superiors; while in that impartiality which proceeds from a high and scrupulous sense of justice and unswerving devotion to truth, he has perhaps never been equalled—certainly never surpassed—by any historian, of whatever age or country. His style, moreover, is for the most part remarkable for its animation, clearness, and grace; and in the general treatment of his subject he exhibits in an eminent degree the "eloquence" and "lucid order" which the great poet-critic of ancient Rome tells us will not be wanting to him who knows how to choose his subject wisely.

Pres'tẹr John or João, [Fr. LE PRÊTRE JEAN, lẹh prătr zhôn,] ("the Priest John,") the title of an imaginary personage whom the Europeans of the middle ages supposed to reign in the interior of Asia and to have been converted to Christianity. Rubruquis, a friar, was sent by Louis IX. of France to search for Prester John, in 1253, and explored Central Tartary, but did not find him. The general belief in his existence originated perhaps in a report of some Nestorian missionaries that Oong, (or Oungh,) a Khan of Tartary, had been converted by them.

Price, (RICHARD,) an eminent English dissenting minister and speculative philosopher, was born at Tynton, in Glamorganshire, in 1723. He was chaplain to Mr. Streathfield, or Streatfield, from 1743 to 1756, after which he preached at Newington Green Chapel and the Gravel-Pit Meeting-House, at Hackney. He married in 1757 a Miss Blundell. He advocated the cause of American liberty in his "Observations on Civil Liberty and the Justice and Policy of the War with America," (1776,) which was a popular work. In 1778 he was invited by Congress to become a citizen of the United States; but he declined. He was an intimate friend of Dr. Franklin and Dr. Priestley. Among his chief works are a "Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals," (1758,) "Four Dissertations, on Providence, Prayer, the State of Virtuous Men after Death, and Christianity," (1766–68,) and Sermons. Died in London in 1791.

See "Life of R. Price," by W. MORGAN, 1815.

Price, (STERLING,) an American general, born in Virginia. He emigrated to Missouri, and represented a district of that State in Congress from 1845 to 1847. He was Governor of Missouri from 1853 to 1857, and joined the disunionists in 1861. He served as major-general at Wilson's Creek in August, 1861, took Lexington, September 20, and retired to Springfield. He commanded a division at Pea Ridge, March, 1862, and at Corinth, in October of that year. In September, 1864, he entered Southeastern Missouri with an army, made a successful raid to Lexington, and, after several fights, returned by a different route to Arkansas about the end of October. Died in 1867.

See a notice of Sterling Price in "Southern Generals," 1865.

Priessnitz, prees'nits, (VINCENZ,) celebrated as the founder of the system of hydropathy, (Kaltwassercur, "cold-water cure,") was born at Gräfenberg, in Austrian Silesia, in 1799. Having been severely injured by a loaded cart passing over his body, he was enabled to effect a cure by the application of cold water, which he subsequently made use of as a healing agent in various diseases when consulted by his neighbours. In 1826 he opened a hydropathic institution at Gräfenberg, which was soon resorted to by invalids from different parts of Germany and other countries of Europe. The fame of his successes became at length so great that the number of his annual guests exceeded one thousand. His system excluded all medicine and stimulants of whatever kind, as well as blistering and depletion in any form, relying only on the various applications of water, abundant out-door exercise, wholesome diet, etc. He died in 1851. The water-cure has been received with favour in the principal countries of Europe, and in the United States.

Priestley, preest'le, (JOSEPH,) an eminent English philosopher, chemist, and theologian, was born at Fieldhead, near Leeds, on the 13th of March, 1733. He studied at a dissenting academy at Daventry about three years, (1752–55,) and became versed in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. At an early age he admitted doubts respecting some doctrines of the orthodox creed, though he had been educated as a Calvinist. He preached to a small company of dissenters at Needham-Market from 1755 to 1758, and then removed to Nantwich, Cheshire. In 1761 he became tutor of languages and belles-lettres in the academy of Warrington, and published "The Scripture Doctrine of Remission," in which he rejects the dogma of the atonement.

During a visit to London he formed an acquaintance with Dr. Franklin, who encouraged him to write a "History of Electricity." He published in 1767 a work with this title, which was favourably received. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1766. In 1767 he took charge of a dissenting congregation at Leeds, where he wrote several works on theology and found recreation in experiments on pneumatic chemistry. He obtained in 1773 the Copley medal for his "Observations on Different Kinds of Air." He discovered the effect of respiration on the blood, and the tendency of vegetation to restore to vitiated air its vivifying principle. He also discovered nitrous gas, muriatic gas, and oxygen, which he called "dephlogisticated air." He obtained the last in 1774 from red precipitate of mercury. "As a physicist and chemist," says Cuvier, "the talents of Priestley were of the first order. His researches and writings have contributed much to the progress of the science."

He published in 1772–74 "Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion." He was librarian and literary companion of the Earl of Shelburne from 1773 to 1780, during which period he published "Experiments and Observations on Air," (5 vols., 1774–80,) a "Defence of Socinianism," and other works. In 1780 he settled at Birmingham as minister of the principal dissenting congregation. He incurred public odium by the heterodox and liberal opinions expressed in his "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," (1782,) "Familiar Letters to the Inhabitants of Birmingham," (1790,) and "Reply to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution," (1791.) In July, 1791, his house was attacked and set on fire by a mob, who inflicted great damage on his library, apparatus, etc., while he and his family escaped by flight. For the sake of a more tranquil life, he emigrated with his wife and children in 1794 to Northumberland, Pennsylvania, where he was coldly received, especially by the Anti-Gallican party. Died in February, 1804.

Pringle, pring'g'l, (Sir JOHN,) a British physician, born in Roxburghshire, Scotland, in 1707. He studied at Leyden and in Paris, settled in Edinburgh about 1734, and became physician to the Earl of Stair, who was commander of the army on the continent, in 1742. In 1743 he was appointed chief physician to the army in Flanders. He held this office until the peace of 1748, after which he resided in London. He gained a European reputation by a valuable work "On the Diseases of the Army," (1752.) In 1763 he was appointed physician to the queen. He was elected president of the Royal Society in 1772, and became physician-extraordinary to George III. in 1774. In 1778 he succeeded Linnæus as member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris. He corresponded with the most eminent scientific men of Europe. Among his works was a treatise entitled "Experiments on Septic and Antiseptic Substances," (1750,) which obtained the Copley medal Died in 1782.

Pringle, (THOMAS,) a meritorious Scottish poet, born at Blaiklaw, in Teviotdale, in January, 1789. During his infancy an accident occurred which compelled him to use crutches for life. He wrote in 1816 "The Autumnal Excursion," a poem, which procured for him the friendship of Sir Walter Scott. In 1817 he united with Lockhart, Wilson, and others in founding the "Edinburgh Monthly Magazine," of which for a short time he was the editor. During his connection with it the name was changed to "Blackwood's Magazine." He emigrated in 1820 to the Cape of Good Hope, where he edited the "South African Journal" and founded an academy. His success having been hindered by the enmity of the governor, he returned to England in 1826, and published a very interesting "Narrative of a Residence in South Africa." He wrote a number of poems, which are admired for elegance. Died in 1834.

Pringsheim, prĭngs'hīm, (NATHANAEL,) a German (Jewish) botanist, born near Landsberg, in Silesia, November 30, 1823. He was from 1864 to 1868 botanical professor in Jena. He has published many books and papers setting forth his discoveries, chiefly in the minute anatomy and reproduction of cryptogamous plants.

Prins, prĭns, (J. H.,) a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1758 or 1759. He painted views of the interiors of cities. Died about 1805.

Prin'sep, (CHARLES ROBERT,) an English political economist, born about 1788, published an "Essay on Money," (1818,) and translated Say's "Political Economy" from the French. Died in 1864.

Prinsep, (HENRY THOBY,) an English Orientalist, born in 1792, was a son of John Prinsep, M.P. He entered the civil service of the East India Company, and became a director in 1849. Died February 11, 1878.

Prinsep, (JAMES,) an eminent English Orientalist, born in 1800. He entered the service of the East India Company in his youth, passed some years at Benares as assay-master, and wrote "Sketches of Benares." Having removed to Calcutta, he became in 1832 editor of the "Journal of the Asiatic Society," for which he wrote valuable articles on chemistry, Indian coins, and Indian antiquities. He succeeded H. H. Wilson as secretary of the Asiatic Society in 1832. He made some important discoveries in the history of India by the aid of inscriptions, which he deciphered, and which had baffled other antiquaries. He died at sea, during a voyage to England, in 1840.

Prinsep, (VALENTINE C.,) an English painter, born in India, February 14, 1838. He was trained for the India service in the Haileybury College, but devoted himself with great success to art. His paintings exhibit marked power and originality and great beauty of colouring. His most famous picture is "The Assemblage of Delhi." He is author of "Imperial India," a book of travels.

Printz, prĭnts, (WOLFGANG CASPAR,) a German composer, born in the Palatinate in 1641. He published a "Historical Description of Song and Music," (1690,) and other works. Died at Sorau in 1717.

Priolo, pre'o'lo', or Prioli, pre'o'le', (BENJAMIN,) a French historian, of Italian extraction, was born in Saintonge in 1602. He wrote, in Latin, a "History of France from the Death of Louis XIII.," (1662,) which is praised by Bayle. Died in 1667.

See J. RHODIUS, "De Vita B. Prioli," 1672.

Prĭ'ọr, (Sir JAMES,) an English biographer and surgeon, born in 1790, served many years in the navy. He wrote a "Life of Edmund Burke," (1824,) regarded as the best life of that great statesman that has yet appeared, and a "Life of Oliver Goldsmith," (1836.) Died in 1869

See ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors."

Prior, (MATTHEW,) an English poet and diplomatist, was born in Dorsetshire on the 21st of July, 1664. He was educated, at the expense of the Earl of Dorset, in Saint John's College, Cambridge, where he was admitted to his bachelor's degree in 1686, and obtained a Fellowship. To ridicule Dryden's "Hind and Panther," Prior and Charles Montague wrote a poem entitled "The City Mouse and Country Mouse," (1687.) About 1690 he was initiated into public business as secretary to the embassy which was sent to the Congress of the Hague. He was secretary to the embassy which negotiated the treaty of Ryswick, in 1697, and under-secretary of state for a short time in 1699. In 1700 he produced "Carmen Seculare," a poetical panegyric on William III., which Johnson calls "one of his most splendid compositions." He entered Parliament in 1701, and, deserting the Whigs, joined the Tory party, which, having attained power, sent Prior to Paris privately with propositions of peace in July, 1711. He was accredited as ambassador at Paris in August, 1713, and obtained the reputation of a skilful diplomatist. The Whigs, having come into power, recalled him in August, 1714, and charged him with treason. He was imprisoned about two years, (during which he wrote "Alma," a poem,) and was then released without trial. He died at Wimpole in September, 1721. Among his poems are "Solomon," an "Ode on the Battle of Ramillies," (1706,) and several tales. "Prior has written with great variety," says Dr. Johnson, "and his variety has made him popular. . . . If his poetry be generally considered, his praise will be that of correctness and industry rather than of compass of comprehension or activity of fancy. He never made any effort of invention."

Prĭ'ọr, (THOMAS,) an Irishman, noted for public spirit, was born at Rathdowney, Queens county, in 1679. He founded the Royal Dublin Society, and published "A List of Absentees, with Observations on Trade," etc., (1729.) Died in 1751.

Priscian, prish'e-an, [Lat. PRISCIA'NUS; Fr. PRISCIEN, pre'se-ĀN',] a distinguished Roman grammarian, is supposed to have been a Christian, and native of Cæsarea. He taught grammar at Constantinople about 525 A.D., and left several works, which are extant. His work "De Arte Grammatica," or "Commentaria Grammatica," is the most complete and philosophic treatise on that subject that has come down to us from antiquity. Its value is enhanced by many quotations from works which are lost.

Pritch'ard, (ANDREW,) an English naturalist and microscopist of the present century. He published a number of valuable works, among which are "The Microscopic Cabinet," (1832,) a "Natural History of Animalcules," (1834,) "Micrographia: Essays on Microscopes," (1837,) and a "History of Infusoria, Living and Fossil," (1841; 4th edition, 1861.) Died Nov. 24, 1882.

Pritchard, (CHARLES,) D.D., an English divine and astronomer, born about 1808. He graduated at Saint John's College, Cambridge, in 1830, took orders in the Established Church, and in 1870 was appointed professor of astronomy at Oxford. He wrote important astronomical and mathematical papers. Died May 28, 1893.

Prittwitz und Gaffron, von, fon prĭt'ŵits ōōnd gȧf'frōn, (KONRAD,) a German poet, known as KONRAD VON KRECKWITZ, was born near Nimptsch, in Silesia, August 1, 1826. He was educated at Breslau. His lyric poems (1865, 1875, 1881) are thoughtful and well-finished productions, which attracted much attention. He also published some works of biography and criticism.

Pritz, prits, (JOHANN GEORG,) a German Lutheran minister, born at Leipsic in 1662. He preached at Leipsic, Zerbst, and Frankfort, and published several works Died in 1732.

Proæresius, pro-ē-ree'she-us, [Gr. Προαιρέσιος,] a teacher of rhetoric, born in Armenia about 275 A.D. He taught at Athens with a high reputation. Died about 365 A.D.

Pro'bus, (MARCUS AURELIUS,) an excellent Roman emperor, born at Sirmium about 235 A.D. He served with distinction in the armies of Valerian and succeeding emperors, in Egypt, Arabia, Persia, and Germany. He received the command of all the legions in the East from Tacitus, at whose death, in 276 A.D., Probus was proclaimed emperor by his army. The senate confirmed their choice. He defeated the Germans in Gaul, and his rivals Saturninus, Proculus, and Bonosus. He was killed by mutinous soldiers in 282 A.D., and left a very high reputation for virtue and ability. It is said that he had offended his troops by the expression of a hope that the time was near when armies would be no longer necessary.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" AURELIUS VICTOR, "De Cæsaribus" and "Epitome."

Probus, (MARCUS VALERIUS,) a Roman grammarian, born at Berytus, (Beyroot,) lived in the first century of our era. He is identified by some with the Probus of the next article.

Probus, (VALERIUS,) an eminent Roman grammarian, who flourished probably about 100 A.D. He wrote a commentary on Virgil, often cited by Servius, and other works.

Procaccini, pro-kât-chee'nee, (ANDREA,) an Italian painter, born in Rome about 1675. He became painter to the King of Spain in 1720. Died in Spain in 1734.

Procaccini, (CAMILLO,) a painter, born at Bologna in 1545 or 1546, was a son and pupil of Ercole the Elder. He was remarkable for facility and for fecundity of invention. "He had," says Lanzi, "a simplicity, grace, and spirit which charm the eye, if they do not always satisfy the judgment." Among his works are a fresco of "The Last Judgment," at Reggio, and an oil-picture of "Saint Rocco curing the Sick." Died in 1626.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy;" TICOZZI, "Dizzonario."

Procaccini, (CARLO ANTONIO,) a painter, was a younger brother of the preceding. He painted landscapes, fruits, and flowers with success. Some of his works are dated 1605.

Procaccini, (ERCOLE,) THE ELDER, a painter, born at Bologna in 1520, was the father of the preceding. His style was accurate and free from mannerism, but his design was rather minute. Among his disciples were Sabbatini, Bertoja, his three sons, and other eminent artists. He was living in 1591.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Procaccini, (ERCOLE,) THE YOUNGER, a son of Carlo Antonio, was born at Milan in 1596. He was an able painter of flowers and history. Died in 1676.

Procaccini, (GIULIO CESARE,) a brother of Camillo, noticed above, was born at Bologna in 1548, and was the ablest painter of the family. He was one of the best imitators of the style of Correggio. Among his works are a "Virgin and Child" and "The Passage of the Red Sea." His design was correct, his composition ingenious, and his style noble, or grandiose. He worked mostly at Milan, where he died in 1626.

See LANZI, "History of Painting in Italy."

Procida, di, de PRO'che-dȧ, (GIOVANNI,) an Italian conspirator, born at Salerno about 1225, was a partisan of the house of Hohenstaufen. He entered the service of Pedro of Aragon, and was engaged in intrigues or conspiracies against Charles of Anjou, who had made himself master of Sicily. He is said to have been the master-spirit of that massacre of the French called the Sicilian Vespers, (March 30, 1282.) Died after 1302.

Pro-cil'lĭ-us, a Roman historian, was a contemporary of Cicero. His works are not extant.

Pro'clēs, [Προκλῆς,] a skilful Greek engraver of medals, whose period is unknown. His name is found on coins of Naxos and Catana.

Pro'clus, [Gr. Πρόκλος; Ger. PRO'KLUS,] an eminent Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, was born at Constantinople in 412 A.D., and was surnamed DIADOCHUS, ("the Successor.") He studied under Hero and Olympiodorus at Alexandria, and under Plutarchus at Athens, where he afterwards succeeded Syrianus as the head of the Neo-Platonic school. He was very deficient in judgment. Among his numerous works are a treatise "On the Sphere," commentaries on the "Parmenides" and "Timæus" of Plato, a treatise against the Christians, and "Institutio Theologica," (Στοιχείωσις Θεολογική,) all of which are extant, (except part of the commentary on the "Timæus.") He died in 485 A.D. According to the extravagant estimate of M. Cousin, all the philosophic rays which emanated from Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, etc. were concentrated in Proclus.

See BRUCKER, "History of Philosophy;" RITTER, "History o Philosophy;" TENNEMANN, "Geschichte der Philosophie;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Proclus, SAINT, was Patriarch of Constantinople from 434 A.D. until his death, in 446. He left homilies and epistles, which are extant.

Proc'ne, [Gr. Πρόκνη; Fr. PROGNÉ, prog'nȧ',] a daughter of Pandi'on, King of Athens, a sister of Philomela, and wife of Tereus. She was said to have been changed into a swallow.

Procope-Couteau, pro'kop' koo'tō', a French physician and comic author, born in Paris in 1684. His real name was MICHEL COLTELLI. Died in 1753.

Pro-co'pĭ-us, a Roman general, born in Cilicia. He aspired to supreme power in the East in 363 A.D., and waged war against Valens, by whom he was put to death in 366.

Pro-co'pĭ-us, [Gr. Προκόπιος; Fr. PROCOPE, pro'kop',] an eminent Byzantine historian, born at Cæsarea, in Palestine, about 495 A.D. He became in 527 A.D. secretary to Belisarius, whom he attended in his campaigns against the Persians, the Vandals, (in Africa,) and the Goths. In the Gothic war he had a high command in the navy. He returned to Constantinople about 541 A.D., and obtained the favour of Justinian, who appointed him a senator and in 562 prefect of the capital. The question whether he was a Christian or a Pagan has been disputed by many modern writers. His principal work is a "History of his Own Times," in eight books, which is highly esteemed for veracity. His style is commended for vigour and elegance. There is extant a secret and scandalous history of the Byzantine court, entitled Ἀνέκδοτα, which is ascribed to him; but his authorship is doubted. Died about 565 A.D.

Procopius, (DEMETRIUS,) a biographer, born at Moscopolis, in Macedonia, lived about 1730. He wrote, in Greek, a series of biographies of Greek scholars of the seventeenth century, which is commended. It was published by Fabricius in 1722 in his "Bibliotheca Græca."

Procopius OF GAZA, a biblical commentator, flourished about 550 A.D.

Pro-oo'pĭ-us Ra'sa, an able Bohemian general, succeeded Ziska in 1424 as the leader of the Hussites or Taborites. He defeated the Austrians in a number of battles, and ravaged Moravia, Austria, and Saxony. In 1431 he routed an imperial army which had invaded Bohemia. He was killed in battle in 1434.

Pro-crŭs'tēs, [Gr. Προκρύστης; Fr. PROCRUSTE, prō'krüst',] (i.e. "the Stretcher,") a surname of DAMASTES or POLYPEMON, a famous robber, who compelled his captives to lie on a bed, and made them coincide with it in length by cutting off their legs or stretching them in case they were too long or too short. He was killed by Theseus.

Proc'tẹr, (ADELAIDE ANNE,) an English poetess, born in London in 1825, was a daughter of Bryan Waller Procter. She became in 1853 a contributor to "Household Words" and "All the Year Round," and published in 1858 "Legends and Lyrics." A second volume of "Legends and Lyrics" came out in 1861. Died in 1864.

Procter, (BRYAN WALLER,) an English poet, who wrote under the assumed name of BARRY CORNWALL, was born about 1790. He studied law, and was called to the bar in 1831. He acquired distinction by a volume entitled "Dramatic Scenes, and other Poems," (1819.) His tragedy of "Mirandola" (1821) was performed with success. Among his other works are "The Flood of Thessaly," "English Songs, and other Small Poems," (1832,) "Essays and Tales in Prose," (1851,) and "Charles Lamb: a Memoir," (1866.) His songs have obtained much popularity. Died October 4, 1874.

Proctor, (REDFIELD,) an American statesman, born at Proctorsville, Vermont, in 1831. He became a member of the Vermont legislature in 1867, lieutenant-governor in 1876, and governor in 1878. In 1889 he was made secretary of war by President Harrison, and in 1891 became United States Senator from Vermont.

Proc'tọr, (RICHARD ANTHONY), a distinguished English astronomer, born at Chelsea, March 23, 1837. He was educated at King's College, London, and at Saint John's, Cambridge, graduating in 1860. He published a great number of astronomical works and books of popular science, including "Saturn and its System," (1865,) "Half-Hours with the Stars," (1869,) "Other Worlds than Ours," (1870,) "A Treatise on the Cycloid," (1878,) "Chance and Luck," (1887,) and others, mostly on scientific subjects. Died at New York in 1888.

Proc'u-lus, an eminent Roman jurist, was a contemporary of Nerva. He gave his name to a school or sect, (Proculiani or Proculani.) Among the jurists cited in the Digest he is the second in order of time.

Proculus, a Roman officer, who attempted to usurp imperial power in Gaul in 280 A.D. He was defeated by Probus, and put to death.

Prod'ĭ-cus, [Πρόδικος,] an eloquent Greek Sophist or philosopher, born in Ceos, lived about 430 B.C. He lectured at Athens and other places. Among his pupils or auditors were Isocrates, Euripides, and perhaps Socrates. He was accused of atheism without sufficient evidence. He wrote a beautiful apologue entitled "The Choice of Hercules," an outline or abridgment of which has been preserved by Xenophon.

Pro-me'the-us, [Gr. Προμηθεύς; Fr. PROMÉTHÉE, prō'mà'tà',] a personage of the Greek mythology, was a son of Iapetus. According to one tradition, he stole fire from heaven, for which offence Jupiter chained him to a rock or pillar, and an eagle daily devoured his liver, which was nightly restored. Æschylus represents him as an immortal being, a benefactor of men, the giver of fire, and a heroic sufferer, who was oppressed by the power of Jupiter, but maintained an inflexible spirit until he was liberated by Hercules. His name signifies "forethought." Some authors relate that he created a man out of clay and animated him with fire which he stole from heaven, and that he was the husband of Pandora. (See Æschylus, "Prometheus Bound.")

Pro-mo'tus, (ÆLIUS,) a physician of Alexandria, whose period is unknown. It is supposed that he lived before the Christian era. Some of his works are extant in manuscript.

Prompsault, prôN'sō', (JEAN HENRI ROMAIN,) a French ecclesiastical writer, born at Montélimart in 1798. He published a "Dictionary of Canon Law," and several works on grammar. Died in 1858.

Prony, de, dẹh prō'ne', (GASPARD CLAIR FRANÇOIS MARIE RICHE,) a French mathematician and engineer, born at Chamelet (Rhône) in July, 1755. He was appointed in 1791 director of the Cadastre, and received an order to compose logarithms or mathematical tables adapted to the decimal division of the circle, a work of great labour and utility. In 1791 he was appointed chief engineer of bridges and causeways. He became about 1794 professor of mechanics in the Polytechnic School, a member of the Bureau of Longitudes, and a member of the Institute. In 1798 he was invited by Bonaparte to join the expedition to Egypt, but declined. He received the title of baron in 1828, and became a peer of France in 1835. Among his principal works are "Hydraulic Architecture," (2 vols., 1790–96,) "Philosophical Mechanics," (1800,) "Lectures on Analytical Mechanics," (1810,) and a "Hydrographic and Statistical Description of the Pontine Marshes," (1823,) which is a work of much merit. He wrote a number of articles for the "Biographie Universelle." Died in 1839.

Properce. See PROPERTIUS.

Propertius, pro-pẹr'she-us, [Fr. PROPERCE, prō'pĕrss'; It. PROPERZIO, prō-pĕrt'se-o,] (SEXTUS AURELIUS,) an eminent Roman elegiac poet, born in Umbria about 50 B.C. He informs us that he was born in Umbria, on the border of Etruria. His paternal estate was confiscated by Octavius because his father had been a partisan of Antony. He began early to write poetry, became a resident of Rome, and obtained the patronage of Mæcenas. His life appears to have been that of "a man of wit and pleasure about town." His career as a poet was influenced by a passion for Cynthia, a poetess and lady of superior talents, who furnished a theme for his early elegies. He chose Callimachus as his model, and became a rather pedantic imitator of the Greeks. His style is censured as too artificial. Both ancient and modern critics, however, assign to him a high rank as a poet. He enjoyed the friendship of Ovid. The time of his death is unknown. Four books of elegies are the only works of Propertius that are now extant. A correct English version of his first book was published anonymously in 1781. Among the best editions of the text is that of Lachmann, (Leipsic, 1816.)

Propiac, de, dẽh pro'pe'ăk', (CATHERINE JOSEPH FERDINAND GIRARD,) a French littérateur, born at Dijon in 1759; died in 1823.

Pros'er-pīne, [Gr. Περσεφόνη, (Persephone;) Fr PROSERPINE, pro'zĕr'pēn'; Lat. PROSERPI'NA,] the goddess and queen of the infernal regions, was said to have been a daughter of Jupiter and Ceres, and the wife of Pluto. The poets feigned that as she was gathering flowers near Enna she was abducted by Pluto; that Ceres, not knowing what had become of her, searched for her with torches in all parts of the earth for nine days; that Helios revealed the secret of her abduction; that Jupiter, induced by the importunity of Ceres, requested Pluto to restore her, and that Pluto consented that she should spend two-thirds of the year with the gods above, and the other third in the lower world. Later writers say that she was to pass the half of her time in Hades and the other half in the regions of light. She is supposed to be a symbol of vegetation, and of the creative and destructive power of heat.

Proske, pros'keh, (KARL,) a German musical archæologist, born at Gröbing, in Upper Silesia, in 1794. He edited a celebrated collection of ancient church music, called "Musica Divina." Died December 20, 1861.

Prosper, pros'pair', surnamed AQUITA'NUS, ("of Aquitaine,") a theologian, born at Bordeaux, in Gaul, about 404 A.D. He was a zealous opponent of the Semi-Pelagians, and wrote in defence of the doctrines of Saint Augustine. His works, among which are some poems, are still extant. Died after 463 A.D.

Pros'per Tī'ro or Tȳ'ro, a poet, who is often confounded with Prosper Aquitanus, was born in Gaul, and lived about 400 A.D. He wrote a "Poem of a Husband to his Wife," ("Poema Conjugis ad Uxorem.")

Prost, pro, (CLAUDE,) BARON, a French general, born at Auxonne in 1764; died in 1834.

Prost de Royer, pro dẽh rwȧ'yȧ', (ANTOINE FRANÇOIS,) a French jurist, born at Lyons in 1729; died in 1784.

Pro-tag'o-ras, [Gr. Πρωταγόρας; Fr. PROTAGORE, pro'tȧ'gor',] an eminent Greek philosopher and Sophist, born at Abdera, in Thrace, flourished about 440 B.C. He is said to have been a pupil of Democritus; but this is doubted by some, because Protagoras was probably older than his supposed master. According to Plato and Diogenes, he was the first who adopted the name of Sophist and taught for pay. He taught oratory at Athens and other cities. He was banished from Athens because he said that he did not know whether the gods existed or not. His works, which treated on ethics, physics, etc., are lost, but his peculiar doctrines are explained in the "Theætetus" of Plato. He reached the age of seventy or more, and died about 410 B.C. It was a maxim of Protagoras that "man is the measure of the universe or of all things, and that whatever he judges to be true is true." Cicero says, "Putet id cuique verum esse quod cuique videatur." ("Quæstiones Academicæ.")

Protagore. See PROTAGORAS.

Protain, pro'tăn', (JEAN CONSTANTIN,) a French architect, born in Paris in 1769. He was employed in Egypt in 1798–99 as architect to the commission of arts and sciences, and became a member of the Institute of Cairo in 1801. Died in 1837.

Protais, pro'tȧ', (PAUL ALEXANDRE,) a French painter, born in Paris in 1826. He followed the French armies in the Crimean war and in the Italian campaign of 1859, and from the first his art was almost entirely devoted to military subjects. Died January 27, 1890.

Protee. See PROTEUS.

Protet, pro'tȧ', (AUGUSTE LÉOPOLD,) a French rear-admiral, born at Saint-Servan about 1810. He was Governor of Senegal from 1850 to 1855, during which period he made an exploration of that region. He was killed in a battle against the Taepings of China, in 1862.

Pro'te-us, [Gr. Πρωτεύς; Fr. PROTÉE, pro'tȧ',] a divinity of the Greek mythology, was sometimes called a son of Neptune and a king of Egypt. He was represented as a prophetic old man, who lived in the sea and could foretell future events, but eluded those who seized and importuned him to prophesy, by transforming himself into a great variety of shapes. If his efforts to escape were baffled, he resumed his original or usual form and revealed his secret knowledge. His occupation was to tend the flocks of seals or sea-calves belonging to Neptune.

See HOMER, "Odyssey," book iv.; VIRGIL, "Georgics," book iv. 387–529.

Protogène. See PROTOGENES.

Pro-toǧ'e-nēs, [Gr. Πρωτογένης; Fr. PROTOGÈNE, pro'to'zhȧn',] a Greek painter of great celebrity, was a native of Caunus, in Caria. He flourished about 332 B.C., was a contemporary of Apelles, and lived mostly at Rhodes. The name of his master is not known. His advancement in fame and fortune was retarded by his modesty, until Apelles visited Rhodes and purchased, at the enormous price of fifty talents each, several of his pictures, which he proposed to sell as his own works. (See APELLES.) In the opinion of some, Protogenes carried the elaboration of his works to a fault; but Cicero speaks of his works as perfect in every respect. His master-piece was a picture of Ialysus, on which he is said to have expended seven years. One of the admirable parts of this picture was the foam at the mouth of a hound, "which," says Pliny, "he produced, after many vain efforts, by throwing a sponge at the place, under the impulse of vexation or despair."

See PLINY, "Natural History," book xxxv.; SUIDAS, "Protogenes;" K. O. MÜLLER, "Archäologie der Kunst."

Proudhon, proo'dôn', sometimes written Prudhon, (JEAN BAPTISTE VICTOR,) a French jurist, born in Franche-Comté in 1758. He was for many years professor of law at Dijon. He published, besides other works, an excellent treatise on the laws of Usufruct, etc., "Traité des Droits d'Usufruit, d'Usage, d'Habitation et de Superficie," (9 vols., 1823–25,) said to be the best work on that subject. Died in 1838.

See LORAIN, "Éloge historique de M. Proudhon," 1839.

Proudhon, (PIERRE JOSEPH,) a French socialist and political writer, born at Besançon in 1809. In 1848 he became editor of "The Representative of the People," and was elected to the Constituent Assembly. He made a motion which a large majority of the Assembly rejected as "an odious attack on public morality and subversive of the rights of property." He published several works on social and political economy. In his essay entitled "What is Property?" ("Qu'est-ce que la Propriété?") he affirms that "property is robbery," ("La propriété, c'est le vol.") Died in 1865.

See J. VRAU, "Proudhon et son Économie politique," 1853. QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale:" "Blackwood's Magazine" for March, 1849.

Proust, proo, (LOUIS JOSEPH,) a French chemist, born at Angers about 1760. He was admitted into the Institute in 1816. He contributed many memoirs on chemistry to various periodicals, and distinguished himself as a supporter of the theory of equivalents or definite proportions. Died in 1826.

Prousteau, proo'tō', (GUILLAUME,) a French jurist, born at Tours in 1628. He founded a public library at Orléans, and wrote legal works. Died in 1715.

Prout, prŏwt, (EBENEZER,) an English musical composer and critic, born at Oundle, Northamptonshire, in 1835. He was editor of the "Monthly Musical Record," afterwards musical critic of the "Athenæum," and professor of music at Dublin in 1894.

Prout, FATHER, the assumed name of FRANCIS MAHONY. (See MAHONY.)

Prout, prowt, (SAMUEL,) a skilful English painter of architecture, scenery, etc., was born at Plymouth in 1783. He published about 1816 "Views in the North and West of England," "Rudiments of Landscape," and other successful works. He acquired distinction as a painter in water-colours, a delineator of mediæval architecture, and a lithographer. After a tour on the continent, he published lithographic "Fac-Similes of Sketches made in Flanders and Germany," and "Sketches in France, Switzerland, and Italy," (1839.) Died in 1852. Ruskin pronounces him "a very great man, who, though, partly by chance and partly by choice, limited in range of subject, possessed for that subject the profoundest and noblest sympathy. . . . In reality he is to be numbered among the true masters of the nobler picturesque." ("Modern Painters.")

See J. RUSKIN, "Memoir of S. Prout," in the "Art Journal," 1849.

Prout, (WILLIAM,) an eminent English chemist and physician, was born in 1786. He practised in London, and was probably the first physician who applied the doctrines of chemistry to the explanation of the phenomena of disease. Among his important works are one "On the Nature and Treatment of Stomach and Renal Diseases; being an Inquiry into the Connection of Diabetes, Calculus, etc. with Indigestion," and "Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion considered with Reference to Natural Theology." The latter is one of the "Bridgewater Treatises." Died in London in 1850.

Provana, pro-vä'nä, (ANDREA,) an Italian admiral, born in Piedmont in 1511; died in 1592.

Provenzale, pro-vĕn-zä'lä, (MARCELLO,) an Italian painter in mosaic, born at Cento in 1575. Among his works is a portrait of Paul V. Died in 1639.

Provoost, pro'vōst, ? (SAMUEL,) D.D., an American divine, born in New York in 1742, was chaplain to the Continental Congress and subsequently to the United States Senate. He was elected Bishop of New York in 1786. Died in 1815.

Provostaye, de la, dĕh lä pro vo'stä', (FERDINAND HERVÉ,) a French natural philosopher, born at Redon in 1812. He wrote on optics, heat, etc. Died in 1863.

Proyart, prwä'yär', (Abbé LIÉVIN BONAVENTURE,) a French historian, born at Arras in 1743, published, besides other works, a "History of Stanislas, King of Poland," (2 vols., 1782,) which is commended. Died in 1808.

Prudence. See PRUDENTIUS.

Prudent, prü'dŏn', (ÉMILE,) a French composer and pianist, born at Angoulême in 1817. Among his works is "Fantaisie sur Lucie," (1842.) Died May 14, 1863.

Prudentius, pru-dĕn'she-us, or Pru'dence, SAINT, a learned bishop, born in Spain. He became Bishop of Troyes about 846. He wrote against Erigena on predestination. Died in 861.

See LE CLERC, "Vie de Saint-Prudence," 1689; BREYER, "Vie de Saint-Prudence," 1725.

Pruden'tius (pru-dĕn'she-us) [Fr. PRUDENCE, prü'dŏNss'] Clem'ens, (AURELIUS,) a Latin Christian poet, was born in Spain in 348 A.D. He practised law, and became a judge of a civil and criminal court. He wrote, in barbarous or unclassical Latin, hymns, and other religious poems, which procured for him a high reputation in the middle ages and are admired by some modern critics. He visited Rome about 405, and passed his latter years in Spain. Erasmus thought that his piety and learning entitled him to a place among the doctors of the Church.

See LUDEWIG, "Dissertatio de Vita A. Prudentii Clementis," 1692: TILLEMONT, "Mémoires ecclésiastiques."

Prudhomme, prü'dom', (LOUIS MARIE,) a French revolutionist, born at Lyons in 1752. He issued an ultra-republican journal in Paris in 1789. Among his works is a "History of the French Revolution," (6 vols., 1796,) which is of little value. Died in 1830.

Prudhomme, or Sully-Prudhomme, sü'lē' prü'dom', (RENÉ FRANÇOIS ARMAND,) a French poet, born in Paris, March 16, 1839. He was one of the original "Parnassiens," or "impassibles," a set of young authors who professed a peculiar devotion to art for art's sake. His "Stances et Poëmes" include that chef-d'œuvre, "Le Vase fêlé." He published several volumes of philosophic verse, including a translation of a part of Lucretius's "De Natura," with a very able preface. His "Expression in the Fine Arts" (1884) has a high value. He has been chosen to the Academy.

Prudhon, (JEAN BAPTISTE VICTOR.) See PROUDHON.

Prud'hon, prü'dŏN', (PIERRE PAUL,) a French historical painter, was born at Cluny (Saône-et-Loire) in 1758. Having studied in Rome, he settled in Paris in 1789, and obtained a high reputation. Among his works are "Venus and Adonis," "The Abduction of Psyche," and "Justice and Divine Vengeance pursuing Crime." The gracefulness of his style has procured for him the surname of "the French Correggio." Died in 1823.

See ARSÈNE HOUSSAYE, "Philosophers and Actresses," vol. ii.; VOIART, "Notice historique sur la Vie de Prud'hon," 1824: QUATREMÈRE DE QUINCY, "Notice sur P. P. Prud'hon," 1824: "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Prunelle, prü'nĕl', (CLÉMENT FRANÇOIS VICTOR GABRIEL,) a French physician, born at La Tour du Pin (Isère) in 1777. He lectured at Montpellier from 1807 to 1819, and published several medical works. Died in 1853.

Pruner, proo'nẹr, (FRANZ,) a German physician and ethnologist, born in Bavaria in 1808. He became chief physician of Abbas Pasha of Egypt in 1847, before which he had visited Syria and other parts of the Levant. He afterwards returned to Europe. Among his works are "Man in Space and Time," (1859,) and "The Carthaginians in France," (1870.) Died in 1882.

Prusias, prū'she-as, [Gr. Προυσίας,] I., King of Bithynia, was a grandson of Nicomedes I. He began to reign about 228 B.C., and gained a great victory over the Gauls in 216. He aided Philip of Macedon in his first war against the Romans, but became the ally of the latter about 190 B.C. The power and prosperity of the kingdom were increased by his ability as a ruler. He lacked the virtue or courage to refuse when the Romans demanded the surrender of Hannibal, who had taken refuge in his dominions.

See POLYBIUS, "History;" APPIAN, "Syriaca."

Prusias II. OF BITHYNIA was the son and successor of the preceding. He began to reign about 180 B.C. He was neutral in the war between the Romans and Perseus, his brother-in-law. In 156–154 he waged war against Attalus of Pergamus. Having rendered himself odious by his cruelty, he was killed by his subjects in 149 B.C.

Prutz, prōōts, (ROBERT ERNST,) a German poet and prose writer, born at Stettin in 1816. He became professor of literary history at Halle in 1849. Among his works are "Poems," (1841,) "Political and Literary Essays," (2 vols., 1847,) and "Dramatic Works," (4 vols., 1847–49.) Died June 21, 1872.

Prynne, prĭn, (WILLIAM,) an English Puritan politician and antiquary, was born near Bath in 1600. He published in 1632 a scurrilous pamphlet, entitled "Histrio-Mastix, or a Scourge for Stage-Players," for which the court of the Star-Chamber sentenced him to pay a large fine, to be exposed in a pillory, to lose his ears, and to be imprisoned for life. He was released by a warrant from the Speaker of the Commons in 1641, and elected to the Long Parliament. He was an opponent of Cromwell's, and was ejected from the House of Commons by the army in 1648. He compiled several volumes of Records. Died in 1669.

See ANTHONY WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses:" DISRAELI, "Calamities of Authors."

Pryor, (ROGER A.,) an American Confederate general, born in Dinwiddie county, Virginia, July 19, 1828. He was editor of several papers issued at Petersburg and Richmond, and was elected to Congress in 1859. He challenged John F. Potter, M.C., in 1860, but refused to fight with the weapons which the latter selected. He fought against the Union, with the rank of brigadier-general, in the civil war.

Przhevalski, or Prjevalski, pzhä-väl'skę, (Colonel N——,) a Russian traveller, born in 1839. He became an army officer, and was sent on numerous and important government exploring expeditions, accompanied in most cases by an armed force. The results of Przhevalski's explorations are of the highest value. D. 1888.

Przipcovius, pzhĭp-ko've-us, (SAMUEL,) a Polish Socinian writer, born about 1592; died in 1670.

Przybylski, pzhĭp-bĭl'skee, (HYACINTH,) a Polish writer and translator, born at Cracow in 1756. He produced versions of Homer, Milton, Virgil, Horace, etc. Died in 1819.

Psalmanazar, sal-ma-nā'zar, (GEORGE,) the assumed name of a literary impostor, born about 1679, probably in the south of France. He passed his youth as a vagabond, pretended to be a native of Formosa, and published in England a fictitious account of that island, (1704.) About the age of thirty-two he renounced his evil habits, became religious, and applied himself diligently to study. He obtained considerable success as an English author. He wrote for a work entitled "Universal History" nearly all of the ancient history except that of Rome, and left memoirs of his own life, (1765.) His proper name remains a secret. Died in London in 1753 or 1763.

Psammenitus, sam-me-nī'tus, [Gr. Ψαμμήνιτος; Fr. PSAMMÉNITE, psă'mā'nēt',] King of Egypt, succeeded his father, Amasis, in 526 B.C. He was conquered and deposed in 525 B.C. by Cambyses. Soon after this event he was accused of inciting the Egyptians to revolt, and was put to death.

Psammetichus or Psametik. See PSAMMITICHUS.

Psammis, sam'mis, [Gr. Ψάμμις,] King of Egypt, a son of Psammitichus, reigned from 601 to 595 B.C., and was succeeded by his son Apries.

Psammitichus, sam-mit'e-kus, or Psammetichus, sam-met'e-kus, [Gr. Ψαμμίτιχος or Ψαμμήτιχος; Fr. PSAMMITIQUE, psă'me'tēk'; Egyptian, PSAMETIK,] a king of Egypt, and founder of the Saïtic dynasty, began to reign about 670 B.C. According to Herodotus, he reigned fifty-four years. During his reign, which was an important epoch, the Greeks were first introduced into Egypt.

Psammitique. See PSAMMITICHUS.

Psellus, sel'lus, [Ψέλλος,] (MICHAEL,) a Greek scholar of the ninth century, was a native of Andros, and eminent for learning.

Psellus, (MICHAEL CONSTANTINUS,) a celebrated Greek writer, born at Constantinople in 1020 A.D. He is said to have been the most excellent scholar of his time. He wrote in prose and verse on various subjects, and received from several emperors the title of "Prince of Philosophers." He was living in 1105.

Psyche, sī'ke, [Gr. Ψυχή; Fr. PSYCHÉ, pse'kā',] the name given by ancient Greek poets and fabulists to a personification of the human soul. Having gained the affections of the god of Love, (Amor,) she lived happily with him until her curiosity to know who he was deprived her of his presence. Wandering in search of Amor, she entered the palace of Venus, who reduced her to slavery, from which she was finally liberated by the return of her first love. According to a beautiful allegory of Apuleius, Psyche was a daughter of a king, and her beauty excited the jealousy of Venus, who persecuted her. She was represented in works of art as a maiden with the wings of a butterfly.

See THORLACIUS, "Disquisitio mythologica de Psyche et Cupidine," 1801.

Psychristus, sī-kris'tus, or Psycochristus, sī-ko-kris'tus, (JACOBUS,) an eminent physician of the fifth century, was a native of Alexandria. He became physician to Leo the Great, who reigned at Constantinople from 457 to 474 A.D.

Ptolemæus. See PTOLEMY.

Ptolemäus and Ptolemäer. See PTOLEMY.

Ptolémée. See PTOLEMY.

Ptolemy, tol'e-me, [Gr. Πτολεμαῖος; Lat. PTOLEMÆ'US; Fr. PTOLÉMÉE, pto'lā'mā'; Ger. PTOLEMÄUS, pto-lẹh-mā'ûs, plural PTOLEMÄER, pto-lẹh-mā'ẹr; It. TOLOMEO, to-lo-mā'o, plural TOLOMEI, to-lo-mā'ee,] I., surnamed SOTER, or "Saviour," the son of Lagus, was the founder of the dynasty of Greek kings of Egypt. It is supposed that he was a son of Philip II. of Macedon, as his mother was a concubine of that king. He had a high command in the army of Alexander, and displayed great abilities as a general in India. He was one of the personal attendants of Alexander, who appears to have regarded him with great favour. At the distribution of provinces which followed the death of the king, (323 B.C.,) Ptolemy obtained the government of Egypt. He raised a large army, and formed a secret alliance with Antipater against Perdiccas, who invaded Egypt in 321 and was defeated. As the ally of Cassander, Seleucus, and Lysimachus, he waged by sea and land a long war against Antigonus. This war began in 315, and was ended by the defeat of Antigonus at Ipsus, in 301 B.C. By his able administration Ptolemy rendered the kingdom prosperous and powerful. He promoted commerce, science, and literature, and invited many Greek philosophers and authors to his court. Historians generally represent him as eminent for political wisdom. He died in 283 B.C., and was succeeded by his son, Ptolemy Philadelphus.

See GRIER, "De Ptolemæi Lagidæ Vita et Scriptis;" ARRIAN, "Anabasis," books ii.–vii.; DIODORUS SICULUS, "History," books xvii.–xx.; DRUMANN, "Dissertatio de Rebus Ptolemæorum," 1821.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) II., commonly called Ptolemy Philadelphus,* [Fr. PTOLÉMÉE PHILADELPHE, pto'lā'mā' fe'lă'dĕlf',] a son of the preceding, was born at Cos in 309 B.C. His mother was Bereni'ce. The partial favour of his father secured the throne for him in preference to the eldest son, P. Ceraunus. He pursued a pacific policy, promoted foreign commerce, and employed his vast resources in the patronage of literature and science and the construction of public works. He founded a great library at Alexandria, and a museum which was the resort of eminent philosophers. He had received a learned education, and manifested a special interest in natural history. Among the celebrated men whom he attracted to his court were the poet Theocritus, Hegesias the philosopher, Euclid the geometer, and Aratus the astronomer. According to a tradition which is credited by many, the Holy Scriptures were translated into Greek by his command. His dominions included Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, Cœle-Syria, and parts of Arabia and of Libya. During his reign Egypt was raised to a high degree of power and prosperity. He died in 247 B.C.

See JUSTIN, "History," books xvii. and xviii.; DROYSEN, "Hellenismus;" GEORG GREEN, "Dissertatio de Ptolemæo (II.) Philadelpho," 1676; DRUMANN, "Dissertatio de Rebus Ptolemæorum," 1821.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) III., surnamed EUER'GETES, (the "Benefactor,") [Fr. PTOLÉMÉE EVERGÈTE, pto'lā'mā' ā'vĕr'zhĕt',] was a son of the preceding, whom he succeeded in 247 B.C. To avenge the death of his sister Bereni'ce, he invaded Syria about 245 B.C., defeated Seleucus Callini'cus, took Babylon, and subjected many large provinces of his enemy. His victorious career was interrupted by a sedition in Egypt, to which he returned about 243 B.C. He was distinguished as a patron of literature, and made large additions to the library of Alexandria. His reign was eminently prosperous. He died in 222 B.C. According to Justin, he was poisoned by his son, Ptolemy Philopator.

See JUSTIN, "History," book xxvii.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) IV., surnamed PHILOP'ATOR,† the eldest son of the preceding, began to reign in 222 B.C. He was greatly inferior to his predecessors in ability, and was notorious for cruelty and sensual vices. He put to death his mother and his brother Magas. His army defeated Antiochus the Great at Raphia, near Gaza, in 217 B.C. He died in 205 B.C., leaving one son, Ptolemy V.

* I.e. "brother-loving," so called in irony, because he had excluded his brother Ceraunus from the throne and put to death two other of his brothers. Some writers, however, suppose that he received the surname (which may also mean "loving one's sister") from his having married his sister Arsinoë, to whom he appears to have been tenderly attached, and to whose memory he caused a temple to be erected after her death.

† I.e. "father-loving," so styled ironically because he was suspected (though probably without sufficient grounds) of having poisoned his father.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) V., surnamed EPIPH'ANES, (the "Illustrious,") succeeded his father in 205 B.C., when he was only five years old. During his minority Antiochus the Great conquered Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, but was checked in his encroachments by the intervention of the Romans. At his coronation, in 196 B.C., a decree was issued which has been preserved in the famous inscription of the Rosetta Stone. In his reign the power of the Egyptian monarchy declined rapidly. He died (it is said, by poison) in 181 B.C.

See POLYBIUS, "History," books xv., xvi., xvii., etc.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) VI., surnamed PHILOME'TOR, was an infant when he succeeded his father, Ptolemy V., in 181 B.C. His mother, Cleopatra, was regent until her death, in 173. Antiochus of Syria invaded Egypt in 171 B.C., reduced several cities, and took the young king prisoner. The title of king was then assumed by a younger brother, Ptolemy Euergetes or Physcon. Philometor was soon released, and reigned jointly with his brother for several years. Dissensions having arisen between them, about 164 B.C. Philometor invoked the mediation of the Roman senate, who restored him to the sole sovereignty of Egypt. As an ally of Demetrius II., he led an army into Syria, took Antioch, and defeated Alexander Balas, in 146 B.C. At this battle he was fatally injured by a fall from his horse.

See POLYBIUS, "History," books xxvii.–xxxiii.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) VII., surnamed EUER'GETES or PHYS'CON, obtained the throne in 146 B.C., and put to death Ptolemy Eupator, the infant heir of the late king. Provoked by his cruelty and vices, the people revolted, burnt his palace, and drove him out of Egypt in 130 B.C. He recovered the throne in 127, and died in 117 B.C.

See JUSTIN, "History," books xxxviii. and xxxix.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) VIII., surnamed SO'TER II., and more frequently called LATH'YRUS, [Fr. PTOLÉMÉE LATHYRE, pto'là'mà' lă'tĕr',] succeeded his father, Ptolemy VII., in 117 B.C. He reigned jointly with his mother, Cleopatra, until 107, when she procured his expulsion in order to raise to the throne her favourite son, Alexander. Ptolemy reigned in Cyprus until the death of his mother, (89 B.C.,) and was then restored to the throne of Egypt. He died in 81 B.C., leaving a daughter, Berenice, who succeeded him, and a natural son, Ptolemy Auletes.

The ALEXANDER mentioned in the preceding paragraph is styled Ptolemy IX. by some writers.

See JUSTIN, "History," book xxxix.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) X., (sometimes called Alexander II.,) the son of Ptolemy VIII., was killed by the Alexandrians on account of his cruelty.

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) XI., surnamed AULE'TES (i.e. the "Piper,") [Fr. PTOLÉMÉE AULÈTE, pto'là'mà' ō'lăt',] also surnamed NE'US DIONY'SUS, was a son of Ptolemy VIII. He began to reign in 80 B.C. He was one of the worst kings of the race of Ptolemies, and was dethroned by his subjects in 58 B.C. In 55 he was restored by the Roman proconsul Gabinius. He had two sons named Ptolemy, and a daughter, the famous Cleopatra. Died in 51 B.C.

See DION CASSIUS, "History of Rome."

Ptolemy (Ptolemæus) XII. of Egypt was the eldest son of the preceding. According to his father's will, he reigned jointly with Cleopatra from 51 to 48 B.C. Dissensions between the minister Pothinus and the young queen resulted in her expulsion. Ptolemy was involved in war with Cæsar, who entered Egypt in 48 B.C., and he was drowned in a retreat from a fight with the Romans about the end of that year.

His brother PTOLEMY received from Cæsar the title of king in conjunction with Cleopatra; but his reign was nominal. He was put to death by Cleopatra in 43 B.C.

See CÆSAR, "Bellum Civile."

Ptolemy, (Ptolemæus,) a nephew of Antigonus, King of Asia. He obtained in 315 B.C. command of one of the armies of Antigonus, and defeated the generals of Cassander in Asia Minor and Greece. He was put to death by Ptolemy Soter in 309 B.C.

Ptolemy, (Ptolemæus,) a son of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, born in 295 B.C., was a prince of great promise. He was left in charge of Epirus when his father led the expedition against Italy, in 280. He was slain in a combat against the Spartans, in 272 B.C.

Ptol'e-mў (Ptolemæ'us) Çe-rau'nus, [Gr. ὁ Κεραυνός,] King of Macedonia, was a son of Ptolemy I. of Egypt by his wife Eurydice. Having been disinherited by his father, he retired to Thrace. He murdered Seleucus of Macedonia, and usurped his throne, in 280 B.C. About a year later he was killed in battle by the Gauls, who had invaded Macedonia.

Ptol'e-mў (Ptolemæ'us) Clau'dĭ-us, [Gr. Πτολεμαῖος Κλαύδιος; Fr. PTOLÉMÉE CLAUDE, pto'là'mà' klōd,] a celebrated Greek astronomer and geographer, was a native of Egypt, and lived at Alexandria. His mature life probably extended from 125 to about 160 A.D. Of his personal history we know nothing. He was the most celebrated, but not the greatest, astronomer of antiquity. His contemporaries and commentators usually added to his name the epithet "admirable" or "divine." He was also a great mathematician. His principal work is a treatise on astronomy, entitled Μεγάλη Σύνταξις τῆς Ἀστρονομίας, to which the Arabian translators gave the name of "Almagest," composed of the Arabic article al and the Greek μεγίστη, i.e. "greatest." In this work he availed himself of the observations and discoveries of Hipparchus, to whom he gives the credit with commendable candour. Indeed, it is chiefly through the medium of the "Almagest" that the merit of Hipparchus has been recognized by the moderns. Ptolemy maintained that the earth is a sphere, and that the sun and stars revolve daily around the earth, which is fixed in the centre of the universe. "We find in the Almagest," says Delambre, "a clear exposition of the system of the world, of the arrangement of the celestial bodies and their revolutions, a complete treatise of rectilinear and spherical trigonometry, and all the phenomena of diurnal motion explained and calculated with remarkable precision. . . . Such was the 'Syntaxis,' ('Almagest,') a monument of great value at the present day, since it alone contains the verified (avéré) history of the science, and the whole astronomical knowledge of his times." His astronomical theory is called the Ptolemaic system. He also wrote a work on general geography, (Γεωγραφικὴ Ὑφήγησις,) which for many ages was the chief authority on that subject, and did not become obsolete until the fifteenth century. He gave special attention to the determination of the latitudes and longitudes of places by mathematical processes, but neglected the descriptive part of geography.

Pub-lic'o-la, (L. GELLIUS,) a Roman general, was elected consul in 72 B.C., and was defeated in battle by Spartacus. He supported Cicero in opposition to Catiline. Died soon after 55 B.C.

Publicola, (PUBLIUS VALERIUS,) one of the founders of the Roman republic, was consul with Brutus in 509 B.C., and was author of laws which protected the liberties of the common people, who gave him the surname of PUBLICOLA, "the people's friend." He was re-elected consul in 508 and 507 B.C., and fought against Porsena, who attempted to restore the Tarquins. It is supposed that he was killed at the battle of Regillus, (496 B.C.)

See NIEBUHR, "History of Rome;" CICERO, "De Republica."

Pub-lil'ĭ-us, (VOL'ERO,) a Roman, who effected a change in the constitution. He was tribune of the people in 472 B.C., and procured for the plebeians greater freedom in the election of tribunes.

Pub'lĭ-us Sў'rus, an eminent mimographer, born in Syria, lived at Rome in the time of Julius Cæsar. He was a slave in his youth. At games exhibited by Cæsar in 45 B.C. Publius excelled all competitors as a composer of mimes. There is extant a collection of proverbs or moral sayings ascribed to him.

Pucci, poot'chee, (ANTONIO,) a comic poet of Italy in the fourteenth century. He wrote a chronicle ("Centi-loquio") in triplets, many historical poems, ("Serventesi,") legendary poems, ("Reina d'Oriente," "Apollonia di Tiro," "Bel Gherardino,") etc.

Pufendorf, poo'fẹn-dorf', written also Puffendorf, (ESAIAS,) a German writer, born in 1628, was a brother of Samuel. He is supposed to be the author of a satirical work entitled "Anecdotes of Sweden." Died in 1689.

Pufendorf, (SAMUEL.) See PUFFENDORF.

Püf'fẹn-dorf, [Ger. PUFENDORF, poo'fẹn-dorf'; Lat. PUFENDOR'FIUS,] (SAMUEL,) BARON, an eminent German jurist and publicist, born near Chemnitz, in Saxony, in 1632. He studied at Leipsic and Jena, giving his attention chiefly to the political works of Grotius and Hobbes. He published in 1660 his "Elements of Universal Jurisprudence," (in Latin,) which was received with general favour. Puffendorf was soon after appointed by the Elector-Palatine, Charles Louis, professor of the law of nature and of nations at Heidelberg, that chair having been created expressly for him. He exposed the absurdities of the constitution of the Germanic empire in his work "De Statu Imperii Germanici," published under the name of "Severini de Mozambano," (1667,) which attracted great attention. On the invitation of Charles XI. of Sweden, he accepted a similar professorship at Lund in 1670. He brought out in 1672 his greatest work, entitled "On the Law of Nature and of Nations," ("De Jure Naturæ et Gentium.") This treatise is regarded as superior in some respects to that of Grotius. The new principles which he advocated were violently opposed by some of his contemporaries; but the work procured for him a durable European reputation. He was subsequently appointed historiographer to the King of Sweden, and made a baron. Died at Berlin in 1694.

Puget, pü'zhä', (FRANÇOIS,) a French painter and architect, was a son of Pierre, noticed below. He excelled in portraits. Died in 1707.

Puget, (HILARION PAUL FRANÇOIS BIENVENU,) a French general, born in Paris in 1754. He had a high command in the campaign against Spain in 1793. Died in 1828.

Puget, (LOISA,) a French musical composer, born in Paris about 1810. She has produced songs that had a great vogue in their day, and a couple of operettas.

Puget, (LOUIS,) a French naturalist, born at Lyons in 1629. He gained distinction by researches on magnetism. Died in 1709.

Puget, (PIERRE,) an eminent French sculptor, architect, and painter, born at Marseilles in 1622, was a pupil of Pietro da Cortona, with whom he worked at Rome. He worked as architect at Marseilles, where he also painted some historical pieces. About 1655 he renounced painting, on account of ill health, and devoted himself to sculpture, on which his celebrity is founded. At Genoa, where he passed some years, he executed an admirable statue of Saint Sebastian, a bas-relief of the Assumption, and other works. Having been invited by Colbert, he returned to France in 1669, after which he produced, as sculptor, "Alexander and Diogenes," and "Milo of Crotona," which is regarded as his master-piece. He has been called "the Michael Angelo of France." Died at Marseilles in 1694.

Pughe, pū, (WILLIAM OWEN,) a Welsh philologist and antiquary, born in Merionethshire in 1759. He published a "Welsh-and-English Dictionary," (1793-1803,) a collection of old Welsh poetry and chronicles, entitled "Myvyrian Archaiology of Wales," (1801–07,) and "Cambrian Biography," (1803.) Died in 1835.

Pugin, pü'zhăn', (AUGUSTUS,) an eminent architectural draftsman, born in Normandy about 1765, emigrated to London in his youth. He published, besides other works, "Specimens of Gothic Architecture, selected from Various Ancient Edifices of England," (2 vols., 1821–23,) and "Specimens of the Architectural Antiquities of Normandy," (1825–28.) Died in 1832.

Pu'gin, (AUGUSTUS NORTHMORE WELBY,) an able English architect, born in London in 1811, was a son of the preceding. He was a zealous Roman Catholic, and an admirer of the mediæval Gothic style of architecture. He designed the Cathedral of Saint Marie at Derby, and a great number of Roman Catholic churches at Liverpool, Oxford, Cambridge, Reading, Newcastle, and other places. It appears that his zeal would not permit him to build a Protestant church. His writings, one of which is entitled "The True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture," (1841,) contributed much to the prevalence of the Gothic style of churches. He ruined his constitution by excessive labour, was sent to a lunatic-asylum, and died in 1852.

See B. FERREY, "Recollections of A. N. Welby Pugin and Augustus Pugin:" "Blackwood's Magazine" for December, 1861.

Pugin, (EDWARD WELBY,) an architect, and a son of the preceding, was born in 1834. He designed several large churches of Liverpool, and completed some works which his father had commenced. Died June 5, 1875.

Puglio. See PULIGO.

Pugnani, poon-yä'nee, (GAETANO,) an Italian composer, born at Turin in 1728; died in 1798.

Pugnet, pün'yä', (JEAN FRANÇOIS XAVIER,) a French medical writer, born at Lyons in 1765, was chief physician of a hospital at Dunkirk from 1805 to 1821. Died in 1846.

Puibusque, de, dẹh pü-e'büsk', (ADOLPHE LOUIS,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1801. He obtained a prize of the French Academy for his "Comparative History of the Spanish and French Literatures," (2 vols., 1843.) Died May 31, 1863.

Puisaye, de, dẹh pü-e'zä', (JOSEPH GENEVIÈVE,) COUNT, a French royalist general, born in 1754. He commanded the army of emigrants and Chouans which was completely defeated at Quiberon in 1794. He died in England in 1827.

Puiseux, pü-e'zuh', (VICTOR ALEXANDRE,) a French mathematician, born at Argenteuil in 1820. He became in 1857 professor of astronomy at the Faculty of Sciences in Paris. Died September 17, 1883.

Puisieux, de, dẹh pü-e'ze-uh', (MADELEINE D'ARSANT,) a French authoress, born in Paris in 1720, wrote "Les Caractères," and other works. Died in 1798.

Puisieux, de, (PIERRE BRULART,) VICOMTE, Marquis de Sillery, a French diplomatist, born in Paris in 1583. He was employed in important missions in the reign of Louis XIII., with whom he had much influence. Died in 1640.

Puissant, pü-e'sȯN', (LOUIS,) a French mathematician, born near Châtelet (Seine-et-Marne) in 1769. He devoted himself chiefly to geodesy, in which he acquired eminence, and succeeded La Place in the Academy of Sciences in 1828. Among his works is a "Treatise on Geodesy," (1805.) Died in 1843.

Pujati, poo-yâ'tee, (GIUSEPPE ANTONIO,) an Italian physician, born in Friuli in 1701. He became professor at Padua in 1754. Died in 1760.

Pujol, pü'zhol', (ALEXANDRE DENIS ABEL,) called ABEL DE PUJOL, a French historical painter, born at Valenciennes in 1785, was a pupil of David. He gained the first prize in 1811, and went to Rome with a pension. Among his best works are "Saint Stephen preaching the Gospel," "Cæsar on the Ides of March," and a large picture of the "Renaissance of the Arts," painted on a ceiling in the Louvre. He was chosen a member of the Academy in 1835. Died in 1861.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Pujol, (ALEXIS,) a French medical writer, born near Béziers in 1739. His best work is an "Essay on Chronic Inflammations of the Viscera," (1791.) Died in 1804.

Pujoulx, pü'zhoo', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a mediocre French littérateur, born in Gironde in 1762; died in 1821.

Pulaski, pū-las'ke, [Polish pron. poo-lâs'kee,] (Count CASIMIR,) a celebrated Polish officer, was born in 1747. He was a son of the patriotic Count Pulaski who formed the Confederation of Barr in 1768. Casimir took arms in that year against the Russian invaders, commanded in many battles and sieges, and performed many daring exploits. "Never was there a warrior," says Rulhière, "who possessed greater dexterity in every kind of service." He went into exile in 1772, and entered the service of the United States in 1777. Four days after the battle of Brandywine he was appointed commander of the cavalry, with the rank of brigadier-general. He resigned this command in March, 1778, and raised a body called Pulaski's Legion, which was ordered to South Carolina in February, 1779. He was killed in the autumn of that year, at the siege of Savannah.

Pul-che'rĭ-a, [Gr. Πουλχερία; Fr. PULCHÉRIE, pül'-shâ're',] Empress of the East, born in 399 A.D., was a daughter of Arcadius. She governed the empire in the name of her brother Theodosius from 414 until his death, in 450 A.D., and in her own name from that event until her death, in 453 A.D. She was canonized as a saint by the Greek Church.

See GIBBON, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" CONTUCCI, "Vita dell'Imperatrice Pulcheria," 1754.

Pulci, pool'chee, (BERNARDO,) an Italian poet, born at Florence about 1425, was a brother of Luigi, noticed below. He translated Virgil's "Bucolics," (1481,) and wrote several elegies. He was living in 1494.

Pulci, (LUCA,) an Italian poet, was a brother of the preceding. He wrote "Il Ciriffo Calvaneo," and other poems.

Pulci, (LUIGI,) an Italian poet, was born at Florence in 1431. He lived on familiar terms with Lorenzo de' Medici, to whom his wit rendered him an agreeable companion. His principal work is "Morgante Maggiore," (1481,) a romantic poem, in which the serious and ludicrous are blended, and which contains some beautiful passages. It is sometimes styled a heroico-comic poem. He employed the idioms and niceties of the Tuscan language with much skill. His style was commended as a model by Machiavel. Died about 1487.

Pulgar, del, dĕl pool-gâr', (HERNANDO,) a Spanish historian of high reputation, was born at Pulgar, near Toledo, about 1436. He was appointed in 1482 historiographer of Castile by Queen Isabella, whom he served as secretary and attended in various journeys and campaigns. He wrote a "History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella," (1565,) which, however, does not extend quite to the capture of Granada. Among his works is a collection of biographies, entitled "Claros Varones de España," ("Illustrious Men of Spain," 1524.) He died about 1490.

Pul'len, (HENRY WILLIAM,) an English author, born in 1836. He entered the church, and was chaplain to the Alert in the Arctic expedition of 1875–76. He wrote "The Fight at Dame Europa's School," (1870,) which had an immense sale, "Modern Christianity," (1872,) and various later works. Edited Murray's Hand-books to Italy, Rome, and Greece, (1886–96.)

Pull'man, (GEORGE MORTIMER,) an American inventor, born in Chautauqua county, New York, in 1831. His first field of labour was the moving of large buildings and the lifting of Chicago to a higher level. The next was the invention of the sleeping-car. He began to manufacture Pullman cars in 1863, and devised the vestibule train in 1887. The town of Pullman, Illinois, was founded in 1880 for his shops and workmen. Died in 1897.

Pul'lus or Pul'len, (ROBERT,) an English cardinal, noted as a promoter of learning. Died about 1150.

Pulszky, pool'ske, (FRANCIS AURELIUS,) a Hungarian writer and patriot, born at Eperies in 1814. Having made the tour of Great Britain and Ireland, he published in 1837 "Extracts from the Journal of a Hungarian travelling in Great Britain," (in German.) He took a prominent part in the revolution of 1848, and was appointed under-secretary of state for Hungary. After the defeat of the Hungarians he accompanied Kossuth as an intimate friend to America, and published in 1851 an account of the journey, entitled "Red, White, and Black," (in English,) in which his wife had a part. She was also a contributor to his "Tales and Traditions of Hungary," and wrote "Memoirs of a Hungarian Lady," (1851.) He was pardoned and returned to Hungary in 1867, and was director of the Pesth Museum 1869–94. Died in 1897.

Pulteney, pŭlt'ne, (RICHARD,) an English botanist and physician, born in Leicestershire in 1730. He wrote a "General View of the Writings of Linnæus," (1782,) and "Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England," (2 vols., 1790.) Died in 1801.

Pulteney, (WILLIAM,) Earl of Bath, an English statesman and orator, born in 1682, descended from an old family of Leicestershire. He began his public life as a Whig, entered Parliament about 1705, was appointed secretary at war on the accession of George I., in 1715, and became a brilliant debater in Parliament. He ceased to act with the ministry in 1725, after which he was a determined opponent of Walpole. As the leader of the opposition, or the "patriots," he enjoyed great popularity for a number of years. He contributed to "The Craftsman," edited by Lord Bolingbroke. "He became," says Lord Macaulay, "the greatest leader of opposition that the House of Commons had ever seen." (Review of Thackeray's "Life of Chatham.") When Walpole was removed from power, in 1742, Pulteney might have been his successor. The formation of a new ministry was intrusted to him, but, from timidity or some other reason, he declined the office of prime minister, and recommended the incompetent Lord Wilmington. At the same time he sacrificed his own popularity by accepting the title of Earl of Bath. The composition of the new cabinet was unsatisfactory to his party and to the public. His rival, Walpole, meeting him in the House of Lords, said, "Here we are, my lord, the two most insignificant fellows in England." Died in 1764.

Pul'tock, (ROBERT,) an English author of the eighteenth century. Very little is known of his life. He published in 1750 "The Life and Adventures of Peter Wilkins," a romance, which was praised by Southey.

Pulzone, pool-zo'nà, (SCIPIONE,) a skilful Italian painter, born at Gaëta in 1550; died about 1590.

Pum-pel'lĭ, (RAPHAEL,) an American geologist, born at Owego, New York, September 8, 1837. He studied in France and in the German universities, and was employed by the Japanese and Chinese governments to examine the mineral resources of their respective countries. In 1866 he became professor of mining engineering in Harvard University. He was employed in the geological survey of Michigan, 1870–71, and was state geologist of Missouri, 1871–73. He was engaged on the United States Geological Survey 1879–81 and 1884–91. He wrote "Across America and Asia," etc.

Pŭn'shon, (WILLIAM MORLEY,) LL.D., an English Wesleyan minister, born at Doncaster in 1824. At the age of twenty-one he had earned a reputation as an eloquent orator. In 1868 he left England for Canada, and married his deceased wife's sister, but shortly after her death, in 1871, he returned to England, and in 1874 was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference for the ensuing year. Many of his sermons and lectures were very popular. Died at Buxton, April 14, 1881.

Pu-pī-e'nus Max'ĭ-mus, (CLODIUS,) a Roman officer, who was elected (238 A.D.) emperor with Balbinus. He was killed in 239 by his mutinous soldiers.

Purâṇă, pōō-rä'nȧ, a Sanscrit word, signifying "ancient," and applied to certain sacred books of the Hindoos, treating of the creation, destruction, and renovation of worlds, and of the history of gods and heroes. There are eighteen recognized as eminently sacred. The purânas are very voluminous, comprising, according to Professor Wilson, four hundred thousand stanzas.

See WILSON'S Preface to his translation of the Vishnu Purâna.

Purbach, poor'bȧK, or Peurbach, poir'bȧK, (GEORG,) an eminent German astronomer, born at Peurbach, in Austria, in 1423. He studied at Vienna and subsequently in Italy, and, after his return, succeeded Gmunden as professor of astronomy at Vienna. He wrote an explanation of the first six books of the "Almagest" of Ptolemy, and a work entitled "New Theories of the Planets," ("Theoriæ novæ Planetarum,") which had a high reputation in his time. The celebrated Müller (Regiomontanus) was his pupil. Died in 1461.

Pŭr'cell, (HENRY,) an eminent English musician and composer, born, probably in Westminster, in 1658, was a pupil of Captain Cook. He became organist of Westminster Abbey in 1676, and one of the organists of the chapel royal in 1682. His first compositions were anthems, which were greatly admired. He displayed greater genius in dramatic music and other secular music. In 1690 he produced the music of Lee's "Theodosius; or, The Force of Love," and that of the "Tempest" as altered by Dryden. He composed many songs, cantatas, sonatas, duets, glees, etc. Among his popular works are the song "Genius of England," "Britons, strike Home," (in "Bonduca,") the cantata of "Mad Bess," and several songs in Dryden's "King Arthur." He is considered by some critics the most excellent composer that England has produced. Died in November, 1695.

Pur-cell', (JOHN BAPTIST,) D.D., an archbishop, born in Mallow, Ireland, February 26, 1800. He was educated in Maryland, and in the Sulpitian Seminary of Paris, and in 1826 was ordained to the Roman Catholic priesthood. He became president of the college at Emmittsburg, and in 1833 was consecrated Bishop of Cincinnati. In 1850 he was promoted to be archbishop and metropolitan. The latter years of his life were rendered burdensome by great financial difficulties, caused by his system of receiving money on deposit. In 1880 he retired from the active duties of his position. Died at Saint Martin's, Ohio, July 4, 1883.

Pŭr'chas, (SAMUEL,) an English compiler of travels, was born at Thaxted, in Essex, in 1577. He became rector of Saint Martin's, Ludgate, in London, and chaplain to Archbishop Abbott. He published "Purchas his Pilgrimage; or, Relations of the World and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places," etc., (1613,) and "Purchas his Pilgrimes," (1625,) which are collections of great research and some value. Died in 1628.

See "Biographia Britannica."

Puri, poo'ree or pü're', (DAVID,) a Swiss philanthropist, born at Neufchâtel in 1709. He founded a hospital at his native town, to which he bequeathed about five million francs for charitable objects. Died in 1786.

Puricelli, poo-re-chel'lee, (FRANCESCO,) an Italian poet, born at Milan about 1657; died in 1738.

Puricelli, (GIOVANNI PIETRO,) an Italian scholar and priest, born in the Milanese in 1589. He published "Ambrosianæ Mediolanæ Basilicæ Monumenta," (1645.) Died in 1659.

Purkinje, poor'kĕn-yȧ, (JAN EVANGELISTA,) an eminent Bohemian physiologist, born at Leitmeritz, December 17, 1787. He became a priest, but took a degree in medicine at Prague in 1819. He held professorships of physiology at Prague and Breslau, and in 1852 returned to Prague. He was famous as a skilful teacher, and was the instructor of many excellent physicians. His discoveries in physiology were of great importance. He published, besides valuable professional papers, Czech translations of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" (1835) and of Schiller's lyrics, (1841,) and translated many Czech songs into the Polish. Died July 28, 1869.

Pŭrsh, (FREDERICK,) a distinguished botanist, born at Tobolsk, in Siberia, in 1774. He resided in the United States from 1799 to 1811, and in the latter year went to England. He published a valuable work on the plants of North America, entitled "Flora Americæ Septentrionalis," (London, 1814.) Died at Montreal in 1820.

Pur'vẹr, (ANTHONY,) an English linguist, born in Hampshire about 1702, was a minister of the Society of Friends. He studied Greek and Hebrew, and produced a new version of the Old and New Testament, which he published (1764) by the aid of Dr. Fothergill. Died in 1777. Purver's translation of the Bible has been pronounced superior to all others for "closeness to the original."

Pur'vis, (ROBERT,) an American abolitionist, of Moorish descent on his mother's side, was born at Charleston in 1810. His father was a successful cotton merchant. He aided in founding the American Anti-Slavery Society of Philadelphia in 1833, and was long its vice-president. His house was one of the principal stations on the underground railroad. He and Whittier were mobbed on one occasion. Later he became vice-president of the Woman's Suffrage Society. Died in 1898.

Pū'sey, (EDWARD BOUVERIE,) D.D., the founder of Puseyism, was born in 1800. His father, Philip Bouverie, was a brother of the Earl of Radnor, and assumed the name of PUSEY. He graduated at Oxford in 1822, became Fellow of Oriel College, canon of Christ Church, and Regius professor of Hebrew in 1828. In conjunction with John Henry Newman, he wrote "Tracts for the Times," (1833,) which produced great excitement. He was suspended from his pastoral functions on account of a sermon on the eucharist, which he preached in 1843. He favours auricular confession and several doctrines and practices of the Roman Catholic Church. Died September 16, 1882.

Pusey, (PHILIP,) an agriculturist, a brother of the preceding, was born in 1799. He inherited an estate in Berkshire, which county he represented in Parliament from 1834 to 1852. His political principles were conservative. He wrote several essays on agriculture, and edited the "Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society." Died in 1855.

Putlitz, pōōt'lits, (GUSTAV HEINRICH GANS,) a German nobleman and littérateur, born in 1821, published several dramas, and a collection of charming tales, entitled "What the Forest tells Itself," ("Was sich der Wald erzählt.") Died in 1890.

Pŭt'nam, (FREDERICK WARD,) an American naturalist and archæologist, born at Salem, Massachusetts, April 16, 1839, studied under L. Agassiz at the Lawrence Scientific School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, was an assistant to Agassiz in the Zoological Museum, 1856–64, director of the museum of the Essex Institute, 1864–74, and in 1874 was made curator of the Peabody Museum, Harvard University. He was also professor of archæology and ethnology, Harvard, and curator of anthropology, American Museum of Natural History. He was president of the American Association in 1898. He wrote largely on anthropology, zoology, etc.

Putnam, (GEORGE PALMER,) an American publisher, born at Brunswick, Maine, February 21, 1814. He became a bookseller and publisher of New York, and founded "Putnam's Magazine." He published a "Chronology," (1833,) called in the editions later than 1850 "The World's Progress, a Dictionary of Dates," "The Tourist in Europe," (1838,) "American Facts," (1845,) and other works. Died at New York, December 20, 1872.

His son, GEORGE HAVEN, born in 1844, succeeded to the head of the publishing business, and was very active and efficient in the passage of the copyright law of 1891. He wrote "Authors and their Public in Ancient Times," "Books and their Makers in the Middle Ages," etc.

Putnam, (HERBERT,) librarian, was born at New York city in 1861. He was librarian in Minneapolis 1884–91, in the Boston Public Library 1895–99, and was appointed librarian of the Library of Congress at Washington in March, 1899.

Pŭt'nam, (ISRAEL,) a celebrated American general of the Revolution, born at Salem, Massachusetts, in 1718. He distinguished himself in the French war by his reckless courage and adventurous spirit, and, being captured by the Indians in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga in 1758, was only saved from being burned alive by the interposition of a French officer. On the breaking out of the Revolutionary war, he embraced with ardour the cause of the patriots, and was conspicuous for his skill and bravery at the battle of Bunker Hill. He was made a major-general in 1775. In May, 1777, he was appointed commander of the army of the Highlands in New York. He superintended the construction of the fortifications at West Point. Died in 1790. Among his exploits was a fight with a wolf, which he followed into a dark cavern with a torch and killed with a gun. The aperture of the cavern being very small, he crept in head-foremost, and had a rope fastened to his legs, by which his companions drew him out. This occurred at Pomfret, Connecticut, where he resided. According to President Dwight, he was a "man whose generosity was singular, whose honesty was proverbial, who raised himself to universal esteem and offices of eminent distinction by personal worth and a useful life."

See "Essay on the Life of General Putnam," by D. HUMPHREYS.

Putnam, (MARY LOWELL,) an American writer, a daughter of Charles Lowell, (q. v.,) sister of J. R. Lowell, (q. v.,) and mother of W. L. Putnam, (q. v.) She was born in Boston, December 3, 1810, and married Mr. S. R. Putnam in 1832. Among her books are "Record of an Obscure Man," (1861,) "Tragedy of Errors," 1862,) "Tragedy of Success," (1862,) a "Life" of W. L. Putnam, etc. She is distinguished as a polyglot linguist.

Putnam, (RUFUS,) an American general of the Revolution, born at Sutton, Massachusetts, in 1738, was one of the first settlers of the State of Ohio. In 1788, in company with a considerable number of colonists from New England, he founded the city of Marietta. He was appointed in 1796 surveyor-general of United States lands. Died in 1824.

Putnam, (WILLIAM LOWELL,) an American officer, born in Boston in 1840, was a nephew of the poet James R. Lowell. He graduated at Harvard College, and gave promise of extraordinary genius. Having enlisted as a lieutenant, he was killed at the battle of Ball's Bluff, October, 1861.

Putschius, pŭt'sĸe-us, (ELIAS,) a Flemish philologist, born at Antwerp about 1580. He published a valuable work on the ancient grammarians, entitled "Grammaticæ Latinæ Auctores antiqui," (1605.) Died at Stade in 1606.

Putte, van, (HENRY.) See DUPUY, (HENRY.)

Puttenham, pŭt'tẹn-ạm, (GEORGE,) an English poet, born about 1533. He wrote "Partheniades," and "The Art of Poesie," (1589.) Died about 1600.

Pütter or Puetter, pŭt'tẹr, (JOHANN STEPHAN,) celebrated German publicist, born at Iserlohn, in Westphalia, in 1725. He became in 1757 professor of public law at Göttingen, where he lectured more than forty years. Among his numerous works are "Institutes of German Public Law," ("Institutiones Juris publici Germanici," 1770,) and a "Historical Development of the Constitution of the German Empire," (3 vols., 1786.) Died at Göttingen in 1807.

Puves de Chavannes, (PIERRE,) a French painter, born at Lyons in 1824. He was distinguished for his mural decorations in many French buildings and in the Boston Public Library. Died in 1898.

Puvis, (MARC ANTOINE,) a French agriculturist, born at Cuiseaux (Saône-et-Loire) in 1776. He rendered important services by his experiments and writings on agriculture. Died in 1851.

Puy, du. See DUPUY.

Puységur, de, (ARMAND MARIE JACQUES de Chastenet—dẹh shăt'nā',) MARQUIS, a French general, born in 1751. He was a zealous advocate of animal magnetism, on which he wrote several works. Died in 1825.

Puységur, de, (JACQUES FRANÇOIS DE CHASTENET,) MARQUIS, an able French general, born in Paris in 1656. He was sent to Spain in 1703, with the title of director-general of the troops, and was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general in 1704. In 1734 he received a marshal's bâton. Died in 1743. He left a "Treatise on the Art of War." His father, JACQUES, born in 1602, was a general of some distinction. Died in 1682.

Pyat, pe'ā', (FÉLIX,) a French littérateur, born at Vierzon (Cher) in 1810, composed several dramas and contributed to various journals. He was a radical in politics, and joined Ledru-Rollin in a seditious plot in June, 1849, after which he lived in exile until 1869. He was a Communist leader in 1871. Died August 3, 1889.

Pye, pī, (HENRY JAMES,) an English poet, born in London in 1745. He translated Aristotle's "Poetics," and wrote many poems, among which are "The Progress of Refinement," (1783,) and "Alfred," an epic poem, (1802.) He became poet-laureate in 1790, and was a member of Parliament. Died in 1813.

Pye, (JOHN,) an English engraver of landscapes, was born at Birmingham in 1782. He engraved with success some pictures of Turner, among which are "Pope's Villa," and "The Temple of Jupiter." He published "Patronage of British Art," (1845.) Died in 1874.

Pyg-mā'lī-on, [Πυγμαλίων,] in Greek mythology, a king of Cyprus, who is said to have fallen in love with an ivory image of a young woman which he had formed, and which Venus at his request endowed with life.

Pygmalion, (called Pümelion in some inscriptions,) King of Tyre, and a son of Belus, (Mathan,) is supposed to have lived about 800 B.C., and to have been the brother of Dido, or Elissa, who founded Carthage.

See VIRGIL'S "Æneid," book i.

Pygmées or Pygmæi. See PYGMIES.

Pĭg'mies, [Gr. Πυγμαῖοι; Lat. PYGMÆI, pig-mee'i; Fr. PYGMÉES, pèg'mā',] a fabulous nation of dwarfs, whom the ancients supposed to live near the sources of the Nile, or in India. According to Homer, they waged against the cranes a warfare which was annually renewed. Some writers relate that an army of pygmies once assailed Hercules when he was asleep.

Pylade. See PYLADES.

Pĭl'a-dēs, [Gr. Πυλάδης; Fr. PYLADE, pe'lăd',] a son of Strophius, King of Phocis, was a cousin and intimate friend of Orestes, whose sister Electra he married. The friendship of Pylades and Orestes was proverbial. (See ORESTES.)

Pyle, pīl, (HOWARD,) an American artist and writer, born in Wilmington, Delaware, March 5, 1853. He has devoted himself chiefly to art, and especially to the illustration of books. He has published "The Merry Adventures of Robin Hood," (1883,) and many illustrated articles in periodicals.

Pym, (JOHN,) an eminent British statesman and orator, born at Brymore, in Somersetshire, in 1584. He entered Broadgate Hall, now Pembroke College, Oxford, in 1599, and was elected to Parliament in 1614, after he had acquired financial skill by a service of some years in the Exchequer. He became a leader of the country party, and so strenuously opposed the measures of the court that King James I. stigmatized him as "a very ill-tempered spirit." He represented Tavistock in all the Parliaments held in the reign of Charles I. In 1626 he was one of the managers of an impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham, and made a speech for which he was imprisoned by the court. He was released on his election to the third Parliament. He was once a friend of Wentworth, who, having resolved to desert the popular cause, obtained a private interview with Pym and began to sound him in a set speech. Pym, understanding his drift, stopped him short with these words: "You need not use all this art to tell me that you have a mind to leave us; but, remember what I tell you, I will never leave you while your head is on your shoulders!" In the Parliament which met in April, 1640, Pym made a long and celebrated speech on grievances. "A more massive document," says Forster, "was never given to history." Pym and Hampden were the most eminent leaders of the popular party when the Long Parliament met, in November, 1640. He attacked Wentworth (now Earl of Strafford) in a powerful speech, which had such an effect that he was unanimously, and without delay, impeached of high treason. "The result," says Forster, "proved this to have been, what Pym anticipated, the master-stroke of the time. It struck instant terror into every quarter of the court, and left the king, for a time, powerless and alone." At the trial of Strafford he appeared as accuser. His influence is thus estimated by Clarendon: "I think Mr. Pym was at this time [1641] the most popular man, and the most able to do hurt, that hath lived in any time." On the 22d of November, 1641, he presented to the House the Grand Remonstrance, a final appeal to the people. In January, 1642, the king attempted to arrest Pym and four other members of the House; but they escaped. (See CHARLES I., and HAMPDEN.) Pym had received, through Lady Carlisle, timely notice of this attempt. At a conference of the two Houses on the subject of grievances, in the same month, Pym made a celebrated speech. He was nicknamed "King Pym" by the royalists. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the ordnance of the kingdom in November, 1643. He died in December of that year, leaving several children. Pym was a consummate master of parliamentary science and political tactics. He was not extreme in his opinions, and did not partake of the Puritanic formality and rigorism which prevailed among the members of his party. "There is nothing more remarkable in the speeches of Pym," says Forster, "than what may be emphatically termed their wisdom. . . . The wisdom I have spoken of was, as it always is with the greatest men, a junction of the plain and practical with the profound and contemplative; to such an extent, however, in his case, and in such perfection, as may not be equalled in that of any other speaker of ancient or modern times, with the single exception of Burke."

See FORSTER, "Lives of Eminent British Statesmen;" CLARENDON, "History of the Rebellion;" HUME, "History of England."

Pym, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English physician, born in Edinburgh or in Warwickshire about 1775. He served as surgeon in the army, and was appointed inspector-general of the army hospitals about 1816. He wrote a "Treatise on the Yellow Fever," (1815.) Died in 1861.

Pynacker. See PYNAKER.

Pynaker or Pynacker, pī'nā'kẹr, (ADAM,) a skilful Dutch landscape-painter, born at Pynaker, between Delft and Schiedam, in 1621. He studied at Rome, and returned to Holland. "In his small compositions," says the "Biographie Universelle," "he shows himself a skilful artist. We distinguish the form and aspect of the different species of trees; his colour is always beautiful and true; his distances and skies are vapory," etc. Died about 1676.

Pŷn'chọn, (THOMAS RUGGLES,) D.D., LL.D., an American clergyman, born at New Haven, Connecticut, January 19, 1823. He graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, in 1841, held rectorships in the Episcopal Church, and was a professor in Trinity College, 1855–74, and its president, 1874–83.

Pŷn'chọn, (WILLIAM,) an Anglo-American writer on theology, born about 1591. He emigrated from England in 1630, and was one of the first settlers of Springfield, Massachusetts. Died in Buckinghamshire in 1662.

Pyne, pīn, (JAMES B.,) an able English landscape-painter, born at Bristol in 1800. He became a resident of London about 1835, and visited Italy and Switzerland in 1846. In 1853 he published some beautiful landscapes in a volume entitled "The English Lake District." His style is vigorous and brilliant, but not free from mannerism. He was vice-president of the Society of British Artists for many years. Died in 1870.

Pyne, (LOUISA FANNY,) an English soprano-singer born in 1832. With her elder sister, Mrs. Galton, she visited the United States in 1854, and was received with favor. In 1868 she married Frank Bodda, a singer, and shortly after retired from the stage.

Pyne, (WILLIAM HENRY,) an Englisb painter and writer, born in London in 1770. He painted portraits and landscapes with some success, but gained more distinction by his publications, viz., "The Microcosm, or a Picturesque Delineation of the Arts, Manufactures, etc. of Great Britain," (1803,) a "History of the Royal Residences," (3 vols., 1819,) and "Wine and Walnuts," (1823.) Died in 1843.

See "Autobiography of William Jerdan," vol. iii. chap. vii.

Pŷn'sọn, (RICHARD,) an early printer, who was born in Normandy, and lived in England about 1500. He was king's printer in the reign of Henry VII.

Pyot, pe'o', (JEAN JACQUES RICHARD,) a French physician, born at Isomes (Haute-Marne) in 1792; died in 1841.

Pypers, pī'pẹrs, (PIETER,) a Dutch poet, born at Amersfoort in 1749. He wrote several short poems, and produced many dramas, some of which were translated or imitated from the French. Died in 1805.

See VAN DER AA, "Biographisch Woordenboek."

Pyra, pee'rā, (JACOB EMANUEL,) a German poet, born in Lusatia in 1715. He wrote "The Temple of True Poetry," and other poems. Died in 1744.

Pŷr'ạ-mus, [Fr. PYRAME, pe'rām'.] See THISBE.

Pyrard, pe'rär', (FRANÇOIS,) a French voyager, born at Laval about 1570. He published a "Narrative of a Voyage to the East Indies," (1611,) which is highly commended. Died in 1621.

Pŷ-re'ĭ-cus, a Greek painter of unknown period, is supposed to have lived after Alexander the Great. He painted low subjects with success.

Pyr-got'e-lēs, [Πυργοτέλης,] an excellent Greek engraver of gems, lived about 330 B.C. An edict of Alexander the Great designated him as the only artist who was permitted to engrave the royal seal-rings or gems The extant works ascribed to bim are probably forgeries.

Pyrker, pēēr'kẹr, (JOHANN LADISLAW,) a German poet, born at Langh, in Hungary, in 1772. He became Archbishop of Erlau in 1821. Among his poems is one entitled "Pearls of the Good Old Time," ("Perlen der heiligen Vorzeit," 1823.) Died in 1847.

Pŷ-rom'a-chus, [Πυρόμαχος,] sometimes written Phyromachus or Philomachus, a Greek statuary, who is supposed to have flourished about 300 or 250 B.C. A famous statue of Asclepius is ascribed to him.

Pŷr'rha, a daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, was the wife of Deucalion. According to tradition, she and her husband were saved in an ark when mankind were generally drowned by a deluge. (See DEUCALION.)

Pŷr'rho or Pŷr'rhon, [Πύρρων,] a Greek philosopher and skeptic, was a native of Elis, and was born about 380 B.C. He was a pupil of Anaxarchus or Anaxarchus. It is said that he accompanied Alexander the Great to India. His writings, if he left any, are not extant. He had numerous disciples, and is regarded as the founder of a skeptical school, the doctrines of which are called Pyrrhonism. He recommended a suspension of judgment, and cultivated a habitual composure or tranquillity of mind, (ἀπαθεία.) After his return from India he became high-priest at Elis. Died about the age of ninety.

Pyrrhon. See PYRRHO.

Pyrrhus. See NEOPTOLEMUS.

Pyr'rhus, [Πύρρος,] King of Epirus, a son of King Æacides and Phthia, was born about 318 B.C. His father was killed in battle while Pyrrhus was a child. The young prince himself was expelled by the Epirotes at the age of seventeen, and then joined the army of Demetrius, who was his brother-in-law. He signalized his courage at the battle of Ipsus, (301 B.C.) Having raised a small army, he entered Epirus, and obtained the throne in 295 B.C. His courage and generosity rendered him very popular. Ambition appears to have been his ruling passion. In 291 B.C he was involved in a war against Demetrius, his brother-in-law, for the possession of Macedonia, which he invaded in 287 B.C. The army which Demetrius led against him, impelled by admiration of the character of Pyrrhus, deserted to him in a body, and Demetrius fled from the kingdom. Pyrrhus divided his conquest with his ally Lysimachus, who soon made himself master of all Macedonia. An irresistible temptation was presented to the ambition of Pyrrhus by the Tarentines, who in 281 B.C. solicited his aid in a war against the Romans. His wise minister Cineas could not prevail on him to renounce his vast projects of foreign conquest. In 280 B.C. he crossed over to Italy with about 25,000 men and a number of elephants. The frivolous and unwarlike Tarentines failed to support him with the large army which they had promised. He encountered the superior numbers of the Romans on the river Siris, and defeated them after a long and obstinate contest. His victory was so dearly bought that he is reported to have said, "Another such victory, and I must return to Epirus alone." He made overtures of peace, which were rejected by the Roman senate.

In 279 B.C. another battle was fought, near Asculum where the Romans lost 6000 and Pyrrhus 3500 men. Pyrrhus was unable to improve his victory, and, having received an invitation to aid the Greeks of Sicily against the Carthaginians, he concluded a truce with the Romans in 278 B.C. He remained two years in Sicily, and gained some victories, but failed to conquer the island. Having returned to Tarentum to renew the war against the Romans, he was defeated by M. Curius Dentatus near Beneventum. He retired from Italy to Epirus in 274 B.C., and invaded Macedonia, of which he soon became master in consequence of the desertion of the Macedonian army from Antigonus Gonatas. At the request of Cleonymus, he engaged in a new enterprise, a war against the Spartans, who repulsed his attack on their capital. He was killed in Argos, in battle, in 272 B.C., after having been stunned by a tile thrown from a house by a woman. He was the greatest general of his time, and Hannibal is reported to have said that he was the greatest of any age. "He was reputed," says Plutarch, "to excel in military experience and personal prowess all the princes of his time. But what he gained by his achievements he lost by vain hopes; his desire of something absent never suffered him effectually to persevere in a present pursuit."

See PLUTARCH, "Life of Pyrrhus;" J. B. JOURDAN, "Histoire de Pyrrhus," 2 vols., 1749, and English version of the same; LIVY, "History of Rome," book XXV.; JACOB ABBOTT, "History of Pyrrhus," 1853.

Pȳ-thag'o-ras, [Gr. Πυθαγόρας; Fr. PYTHAGORE, pe-tȧ'gor'; It. PITAGORA, pe-tȧ'go-rȧ,] one of the most celebrated philosophers of antiquity, was born in Samos about 600 B.C. Very little is known with certainty respecting his personal history. His father was Mnesarchus, a merchant, and generally believed to have been a foreigner, (not a native of Samos,) but whether a Phœnician or Pelasgian is uncertain. He is said to have been first instructed in his own country by Creophilus, and afterwards by Pherecydes in Syros. There was a prevailing belief among the ancients that Pythagoras travelled very extensively, visiting Egypt, Babylon, and even India. That he visited Egypt seems very probable, and it is perhaps not improbable that he journeyed as far as Babylonia. The notion that he included India in his travels would seem to have no other ground than the circumstance that certain doctrines of his bear a striking resemblance to some of those held by the Indian Brahmans or Booddhists. He not only taught the doctrine of metempsychosis, (or transmigration of souls,) but, like the Hindoos, made this the ground for inculcating the duty of kindness and tenderness towards animals, and of abstinence from their flesh. It is related that on a certain occasion he interceded to prevent a dog from being beaten, saying that he recognized in its cries the voice of one of his friends who had died. Pythagoras attached a great importance to the study of mathematics. He is regarded as the inventor of several important geometrical theorems, among which may be named the following: that the three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles, and that in any right-angled triangle the square formed on the hypotenuse is equal to the sum of the squares of the two sides. He is said also to have been the inventor of stringed musical instruments.

It is said that Pythagoras first made use of the word philosopher, (Φιλόσοφος,) applying it to himself. He had, we are told, witnessed the various public games of Greece, and came at length to Phlius, in Achaia. Leon, the king of that country, was delighted with his ingenuity and eloquence, and asked him what art or profession he followed. He replied that he was a philosopher. Leon asked him wherein philosophers differed from other men. Pythagoras answered that as at the public games some were contending for glory and others were buying and selling for the sake of gain, but there was one class who came simply as spectators, so in human life there were those who, regarding as unworthy of a wise man the desire of fame or of gain, sought above all to become wise: those he called philosophers, or lovers of wisdom.

Pythagoras differed essentially from the other celebrated teachers of wisdom among the ancient Greeks, in that he combined the character of priest with that of philosopher. He appears to have given great attention to the means of acquiring influence over the minds of men, and for this purpose established a secret brotherhood among his disciples and followers. He had certain doctrines of which he spoke only to his chosen disciples, which, as being strictly limited to those within the favoured circle, were called esoter'ic, (ἐσωτερικά.) Other doctrines were freely communicated to those without, or to the people at large: these were called exoter'ic, (ἐξωτερικά.) One of the necessary parts of the discipline of his pupils was the practice of absolute silence. According to some authorities, they were required to maintain silence for five years, and during that period were not allowed once to behold the face of Pythagoras; but this is probably an exaggeration.

So great was his authority with his disciples that when any one asked why they believed this or practised that, they were wont to answer, αὐτὸς ἔφη, (or ἔφα,) i.e. "he himself said so," (in Latin, ipse dixit,) which was regarded as the most efficient mode of silencing all cavils or doubts.

Pythagoras, on returning from his travels, settled at Crotona, in Italy, where for a time he seems to have possessed an almost boundless influence over the minds of the people. Many of the most wealthy and influential among the citizens of Crotona joined the brotherhood, which soon became the controlling power in the state. Its extraordinary success appears to have rendered its members so arrogant that they became objects of jealousy and bitter hatred to those who were not admitted to the favoured circle,—that is, to the large majority of the populace. An attack was made upon them while assembled in one of their general meetings. The building in which they met was set on fire, so that a great number of them perished in the flames: only the younger and more active, it is said, were able to escape. According to one account, Pythagoras himself perished with the others on this occasion, though some writers state that he died at Metapontum soon after the expulsion of his disciples from Crotona. A similar reaction took place in other parts of Italy; many of the Pythagoreans were killed, and many others were driven into exile. The brotherhood as an organization was completely suppressed. Amid the uncertainty which prevails in regard to the history of Pythagoras and his doctrines, we can form only an imperfect conjecture respecting the greater number of his religious and philosophic tenets. None of his writings are extant; and what we know of his philosophy is derived mainly from writers who understood it very imperfectly.

Pyth'e-as [Gr. Πυθέας; Fr. PYTHÉE, pe'tā'] of Massilia, in Gaul, an ancient Greek navigator of unknown period. He probably lived between 350 and 200 B.C. He sailed to the western and northern parts of Europe, and wrote an account of his discoveries, which is not extant. He described a place called Thule, composed of a mixture of earth, sea, and air. His statements were credited by Hipparchus, but discredited by Strabo and others. He is believed to have circumnavigated Britain.

Pyth'ī-a, the name of the priestess of Apollo at Delphi, where she uttered oracles.

Pythias. See DAMON.

Pyth'ī-us, [Πύθιος,] a surname of Apollo, applied to him because he was worshipped at Delphi, the ancient name of which was Pytho.

Pythius. See PHILEUS.

Pȳ'thon, [Πύθων,] the name of a fabulous dragon of Delphi, killed by Apollo.

Q.

Quack'en-bos, (GEORGE PAYNE,) an American teacher and educational writer, born in New York in 1826, published an "Advanced Course of Composition and Rhetoric," (1854,) "Primary History of the United States," (1860,) "English Grammar," (1862,) and other works. Died December 24, 1881.

Quack'en-bos, (JOHN DUNCAN,) an American author, was born at New York city in 1848. He became a physician, was professor of rhetoric at Columbia College 1891–95, and at Barnard College for Women 1891–93. His works are many and varied, some of them being school-books, others medical treatises.

Quad-rā'tus, [Gr. Κοδράτος,] an early Christian minister, who, according to Saint Jerome, was chosen Bishop of Athens in 125 A.D. He presented an Apology for the Christian religion to Adrian in 126 A.D.

Quadri, kwâ'dree, (ANTONIO,) an Italian writer on statistics and political economy, was born at Vicenza in 1777. He obtained in 1815 the office of secretary of the government at Venice.

Quadri, (GIOVANNI LODOVICO,) an Italian architect and engraver, born at Bologna in 1700; died in 1748.

Quad-rī-gā'rī-us, (QUINTUS CLAUDIUS,) a Roman historian, lived about 80 B.C. He wrote Roman Annals, some extracts from which are preserved by Aulus Gellius.

Quadrio, kwâ'dre-o, (FRANCESCO SAVERIO,) a learned Italian Jesuit and critic, born in Valtellina in 1695. He was employed as professor at Padua, Bologna, Venice, etc. He published, besides other works, a general history of poetry of all nations, ("Storia e Ragione d'ogni Poesia," 7 vols., 1739–59,) a work of great labour and some value. It contains extracts from a great number of poets. Died in 1756.

Quaglio, kwâl'yo, (ANGELO,) an able scene-painter, was a brother of the following. Died in 1815.

Quaglio, (DOMENICO,) a painter, born at Munich in 1786, was surnamed THE GERMAN CANALETTO. He acquired a wide reputation as a painter of architecture. Among his works is a picture of the Ratisbon Cathedral. He contributed much to revive a taste for the architecture of the middle ages. Died in 1837. His father, GIUSEPPE, born in 1747, was a skilful scene-painter. Died at Munich in 1828.

See NAGLER, "Allgemeines Künstler-Lexikon."

Quaglio, (GIULIO,) an Italian fresco-painter, born at Laino, was the ancestor of several artists, noticed above and below. Died in 1800.

Quaglio, (LORENZO,) an architect, born at Laino in 1730, was a son of Giovanni Maria, an architect, who worked at Vienna. Lorenzo designed theatres at Manheim and Frankfort. He died at Munich in 1804. He was an uncle of Giuseppe, noticed above, and father of GIOVANNI MARIA, a painter of architecture and dramatic scenery, who was born in 1772.

Quain, kwān, (JONES,) a skilful anatomist, born at Mallow, Ireland, studied in Paris. He distinguished himself as professor of anatomy and physiology in the London University, now called University College, and resigned this position in 1836. His chief work is "Elements of Anatomy," (6th edition, 1856,) which is said to be better than any English work previously published on systematic anatomy. Died in 1865.

Quain, (RICHARD,) a younger brother of the preceding, and a distinguished anatomist and surgeon, was born at Mallow. He became professor of anatomy at University College, London, about 1836. He was appointed professor of clinical surgery at the University College Hospital in 1848. He published an excellent work entitled "The Anatomy of the Arteries of the Human Body," (1845.) Died September 17, 1887.

Quain, (SIR RICHARD,) a cousin of the preceding, became a physician to the Consumption Hospital, Brompton, and invented the Stethometer. Died in 1898.

He produced in his youth several tragedies and comedies, among which is "La Mère Coquette," (1664,) and was admitted into the French Academy in 1670. His reputation is founded chiefly on his operas, the music of which was composed by Lulli. Between 1672 and 1686 Quinault and Lulli produced fourteen operas, among which "Armide" (1686) is the master-piece. Others are entitled "Cadmus," "Alceste," "Isis," "Persée," "Roland," etc. He is called by some the first writer of French operas. "What can be more beautiful, and even sublime," says Voltaire, "than this chorus in 'Alceste,' 'Tout mortel doit ici paraître'?" etc. Died in 1688.

Quintana, kĕn-tä'nä, (MANUEL JOSÉ,) an eminent Spanish poet and patriot, was born in Madrid in April, 1772. He studied law at Salamanca, where he formed a friendship with Melendez and Cienfuegos. He began to write verses about 1790. His "Ode to the Sea" (1798) is one of the most beautiful in the Spanish language. He wrote other excellent odes, one of which is "On the Battle of Trafalgar." In 1807 he published the first volume of the "Lives of Celebrated Spaniards," (3 vols., 1807–34,) which is highly commended. Between 1808 and 1814 he employed his talents and influence against the French invaders, and wrote several eloquent manifestoes for the national party. These services were rewarded with rigorous imprisonment for six years (1814–20) by Ferdinand VII., who was offended because Quintana advocated liberal principles. He propitiated the king by an ode in honour of his marriage in 1828, and was permitted to return to Madrid. In 1835 he was appointed director-general of public instruction, and became a senator. He directed the education of the young queen in 1840–43. He was publicly crowned with laurel by the queen in 1855. Died in March, 1857.

Quin-til'i-an, [Lat. QUINTILIA'NUS or QUINCTILIA'NUS; Fr. QUINTILIEN, kăN'tē'lē-ĕN',] (MARCUS FABIUS,) a celebrated Roman critic and teacher of rhetoric, was born probably between 40 and 50 A.D. Jerome states that he was a native of Calagurris, (Calahorra,) in the northern part of Spain; but some modern writers think he was born in Rome. He obtained a high reputation as a pleader, and was the first public instructor who received from the imperial treasury a regular salary. Among his pupils was the Younger Pliny. He taught rhetoric for twenty years, and retired from that profession in the reign of Domitian, who appointed him preceptor of his grand-nephews. His chief work is a treatise on the education of an orator, "Institutio Oratoria," divided into twelve books. This is the most complete and methodical treatise on rhetoric that has come down to us from antiquity. An entire copy of it was found by Poggio at Saint Gall in 1417. His style is clear, elegant, and highly polished. His practical ideas are good, but his criticisms are rather superficial. He gives judicious precepts for students, and interesting details of the education and classic studies of the ancients. His merit consists in sound judgment, propriety, and good taste, rather than in originality or elevation of mind. He is supposed to have died about 118 A.D. He wrote a work on the corruption or decadence of eloquence, "De Causis Corruptæ Eloquentiæ," which is not extant. His "Institutio" has been translated into Englisb by Guthrie (1756) and Patsall, (1774.)

Quintinie, de la, dẹh lȧ kăN'tē'nē', (JEAN,) an eminent French gardener and writer on gardening, was born at Chabanais (Angoumois) in 1626. He was appointed intendant of the fruit-gardens of the king at Versailles in 1673. He made much improvement in the cultivation of fruit-trees, and left a work which was for a long time the guide of French cultivators. It is entitled "Directions for Fruit and Kitchen Gardens," ("Instructions pour les Jardins fruitiers et potagers," 1690.) Died in 1688.

Quin'tus Cal'a-ber or Q. Smyr-næ'us, (smir-enee'us,) [Fr. QUINTUS DE CALABRE, kăN'tüss' dẹh kȧ'lȧbr', or QUINTUS DE SMYRNE, kăN'tüss' dẹh smèrn,] a Greek poet, known only as the author of one poem, is supposed to bave lived about 500 A.D. He is called CALABER because a manuscript of his work was found in Calabria. According to his own statement, he was a native of Smyrna. He wrote a continuation of Homer's "Iliad," (Ὁμήρου Παραλειπόμενα,) which contains some beautiful passages. The subjects of it are those events of the Trojan war which are not related by Homer.

Quin'tus Cur'tius (kur'she-us) Rū'fus, [Fr. QUINTE-CURCE, kăNt kürss; It. QUINTO CURZIO, kwĕn'to koort'se-o,] a Roman historian of uncertain period, is supposed to have lived after the Augustan age. Nothing is known of his birthplace or personal history. We find in ancient writers no passage which certainly refers to him. He is the author of a "History of Alexander the Great," ("De Rebus Alexandri Magni Regis Macedonum,") in ten books, of which the first and second are lost. The merit of this history is variously estimated. His style is easy, clear, and rhetorical. He is deficient in critical judgment and in a knowledge of geography and military tactics. Among his modern admirers are Vossius, Bayle, Rapin, Tiraboschi, and La Harpe. His work bas been translated into English by Brende and Digby.

Rabelais, rä′bẹh-lā′ or räb′lā′, [Lat. RABELÆ′SIUS,] (FRANÇOIS,) a famous and humorous French satirist, born at Chinon, in Touraine, in 1495, or, as some say, in 1483. At an early age he joined the order of Franciscans, but, finding the monastic life incompatible with his genial disposition, he quitted the convent without the consent of his superiors. He had made himself master of Greek, Latin, and other languages. He was also versed in several sciences. It is difficult or impossible to distinguish the real events of his life amidst the multitude of strange adventures and ludicrous anecdotes which are told respecting him. He began to study medicine at Montpellier about 1530, after which he practised at Lyons. In 1536 he accompanied to Rome the ambassador Cardinal Du Bellay, who had been his friend in early life. He obtained absolution from the pope for his neglect of the monastic vows, and took his degree in medicine at Montpellier in 1537. His chief work is a humorous romance, entitled "The Pleasant Story of the Giant Gargantua and his Son Pantagruel," ("Les Faits et Dicts du Géant Gargantua et de son Fils Pantagruel,") in which he satirizes all classes of society, especially the monks. He obtained from Francis I. in 1545 a privilege to print the third part of this work. The first part had been published anonymously in 1535. The work was denounced as heretical by the clergy and monks, but the author was protected by Francis I. He became curate of Meudon about 1545. Died about 1553.

"The most celebrated," says Hallam, "and certainly the most brilliant performance in the path of fiction that belongs to this age is that of Rabelais. Few books are less likely to obtain the praise of a rigorous critic; but few have more the stamp of originality, or show a more redundant fertility always of language and sometimes of imagination." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") "Beyond a doubt," says Coleridge, "he was among the deepest as well as boldest thinkers of his age. . . . I class Rabelais with the great creative minds, Shakspeare, Dante, Cervantes, etc."
